"Conservation, education, recreation and research are all interrelated items that go into making an accredited zoo the best it can be," said Troy Gilmore, education assistant at the Sunset Zoo.

Gilmore spoke Wednesday night in Ackert Hall for the Northern Flint Hills Audubon Society's monthly meeting.

Gilmore said the Sunset Zoo has gone beyond the traditional cages and animals in all four areas.

He said the zoo of today realizes that the more we lose on this planet, the closer humans are to extinction.

"Zoos all over have made tremendous advances within recent years in the areas of nutrition, medicine, animals' health, social structure, breeding and daily enriching their life," he said.

Sunset Zoo's animal management master plan outlines how the zoo will care for the animals it has and carefully evaluate the need in acquiring or disposing any animals that will be added or removed from the current collection, Gilmore said.

Gilmore said education is an important tool in conveying the information of conservation and research to the public.

"Sunset Zoo realizes that just teaching about these issues will not make them go away," he said.

Graphics and signs have taken an artful and informative style. Zoo classes, tours and animal programs have all become very popular at the Sunset Zoo, he said.

Gilmore said in the past 30 years, the Sunset Zoo has made great strides to become the best it can possibly be. Manhattan and the surrounding area should be proud to have such an attraction in its community, he said.

Gilmore also presented a live birds-of-prey show for the Audubon Society.

Among those birds was a great horned owl, a red-tailed hawk, a Mississippi kite and a short-eared owl.

"Zoos all over have made tremendous advances within recent years in the areas of nutrition, medicine, animals' health, social structure, breeding and daily enriching their life."

WILLARD GALLERY

A new exhibit by Emporia artist Dan R. Kirchhefer is in the Willard Gallery.

Kirchhefer, who teaches art at Emporia State University, was picked this year as the juror of the Undergraduate Student Comprehensive Art Exhibition.

On Friday, Kirchhefer gave a gallery talk to a crowd of art students, local art patrons and art department faculty.

Rosella Ogg, assistant professor of art, said this was the first time an exhibition of the juror's work has been arranged before the students' exhibition.

"It's an opportunity to see what the juror's work is like," she said.

The exhibition committee, chaired by Jim Swyler, chooses a juror each year.

"We look for people we know are active and we know are producing strong work on their own," Ogg said.

She said the committee also tries to find an artist within Kansas and possibly from a Kansas Board of Regents school.

Kirchhefer's work, composed mostly of prints, ranges from studies of the human body to depictions of palm trees.

Kirchhefer said his palm-tree motif spawned from his childhood memories of a train trip to California and seeing palm trees for the first time.

He said he used to draw as realistically as possible, and that is still somewhat evident in his work.

A lot of the detail in his body studies is concerned with the depiction of wounds. In one study, a nude woman is ambiguously drawn, but her injured hand stands out in precise detail.

Kirchhefer was knowledgeable about art history and its effect on his work. He is one of the few artists working in this region who dare admit their influences and mention specific reasons for creating their work.

The Willard Gallery is open from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. Monday through Friday.

The student exhibition, which will be at Commerce Bank in downtown Manhattan, runs from March 31 to April 7.

The show is open to all students, and submitted work must have been completed in an art department course or under the supervision of an art department instructor.

For more information about the exhibition, call the art department at 532-6605.

UNION ART GALLERY

"Homegrown," a graduate exhibit by artist Rusty Nelson, graduate student in art, is now showing through Friday.

Nelson, who has exhibited some of this work in student group shows this year, specializes in sentimental depictions of small-town life, particularly farm existence.

"Porch Song," a portrayal of a family arranged on the edge of a farmhouse porch, is characteristic of old photographs, something the artist said influenced him. However, the children in most every painting appear eerily aged. The boy in "Porch Song," particularly in the face, appears as old as his father.

His oil painting "A Woman of Property," like a lot of his work, is Farmers are stripping, but it's not burlesque.

To be precise, farmers across the nation are saving the soil by stripcropping–planting strips of grass between row crops. IN OUR OPINION

by the Collegian Editorial Board

Are you sure you're ready for spring break?

Have a safe spring break and remember that the student body has power potential in this city.

With spring break only two short days away, there still are very important things to remember before you leave — whether you've packed the right clothes, whether you have plenty of sunscreen and whether you and all of your friends are registered to vote in the upcoming city-commission elections on April 4.

To get in the mood to get registered by the March 20 deadline, here's an idea. Gather all of your friends around and play the "what could the city do for me" game. It's simple — just get into a big group and decide what the student body could make the city do if 17,000-plus students voiced their opinions through votes.

Spring break is an excellent time to reflect and make a very large list of things that you and the city commission have in common. The list could start with things like annexation and taxes. We are paying more taxes now that the campus has been annexed. You should want your money going back to campus-related concerns.

The easiest way to get started is to get registered to vote. Then, find a candidate that shares your same views and vote for him or her.

Have a safe spring break and remember that the student body has power potential in this city. You are not just a student — you are also a Manhattan resident with a vote.

Harmony isn't found in technology

JOHN HART

Counterculture icon Dr. Timothy Leary extolled the virtues of chaos and virtual-reality technology during his speech last night in McCain Auditorium.

Leary encouraged the audience to put their minds in a state of chaos in order to be in harmony with a chaotic universe. Modern technology should be used to achieve this state.

Perhaps the title of Leary's Free Your Mind Week lecture should have been Losing Your Mind.

Leary also said the increasing amount of information available to each generation will make it more intelligent than preceding generations. While more information might make us smarter, it certainly doesn't always make us wiser.

It is true that technological advances have produced many benefits for our society, but many undesirable and unintended results have occurred as well.

Technology is making our lives easier and more convenient, but it is also making people more alienated and numb.

Computers have led to more efficient production in business, but systems like Super Nintendo have in effect caused many children to live an isolated existence. If the youth of our society can't use Nintendo with restraint, imagine what will happen when virtual reality entertainment hits the market.

Since this is Free Your Mind Week, I'll let your imagination consider the vast possibilities of virtual reality technology. I'm certain many options won't be helpful to the minds of 8-year-olds.

I know for myself that if I had Super Nintendo as a child, I probably would have never left the house. In fact, I was so enthralled with Atari 2600 back in 1982 that my brother and I unpacked the system our parents bought us as a Christmas gift and played a few rounds of Combat — the tank=battle game.

In his book, "The Comfort Trap," author and Manhattan resident Tim Bascom describes how American culture makes it difficult for people to live fulfilling lives. Our high premium on convenience, our worship of busyness and the distractions of the information age all contribute to trapping us within a prison of invisible walls. According to Bascom, the first step in breaking free is recognizing those walls.

It is ironic that Leary, the epitome of counterculturalism, is currently trumpeting ideals embraced by mainstream America, that technological advances will make our lives easier, more convenient and happier.

Advances in technology don't necessarily lead to progress. Only when a society has the self-control to use technology with wisdom and restraint will it lead to progress.

Leary once said he saw himself as the leader of a spiritual revolution that would overthrow "original sin, the book of Genesis and the whole Judeo-Christian bad trip." I'm sure our society would be better off if we all used LSD instead of following crazy commands in the Bible like "don't lie" and "don't commit adultery."

The greatest error Leary made in his lecture was claiming that chaos was the law of the universe.

Order, not chaos, is the law of the universe. A few simple laws of physics can explain innumerable phenomena in the universe. For example, using some of these laws, astronomers can scan any one of millions of stars and describe its age, size, and chemical composition with great precision.

One activity I recommend during "free your mind week" is to take a walk alone or with a friend without the distraction of a walkman and contemplate the true nature of the universe and our place in it. Perhaps then, you will begin the journey to freeing your mind.

Boy Scouts should encompass all beliefs

"If you give me your cookies today, I'll let you have mine tomorrow."

DAN LEWERENZ

"How do I know you'll even bring cookies tomorrow?"

"My parents are having some friends over, and I know there'll be some left. I'll bring them tomorrow. Scouts honor."

I don't know how many times this or some similar conversation took place in the cafeteria when I was in grade school. That's when "Scouts honor" meant something.

Scouting was an activity that promoted honesty, kindness and service among youth, bringing children together for fun and fellowship.

The lessons learned, from managing fires to tying knots to performing first aid, were life skills that could be used in many a setting and were not quickly forgotten.

Recently, the Coronado Area Council of the Boy Scouts of America tarnished that image with a blatant act of discrimination. And last Friday, the Kansas Supreme Court upheld the right of the Boy Scouts to exclude individuals on the basis of their religious beliefs.

So how are scouts to learn to deal with divergent belief systems if those people are not allowed to become members or leaders?

Brad Seabourn, a graduate student in grain science and former Collegian columnist from 1744 to 1995, wrote a letter to the Council's office in Salina declaring that he was an atheist.

"Call me a believer in 'nothing,' a nonbeliever, or call me an atheist — they are all the same," Seabourn stated in his letter.

In response, the Council decided that Seabourn was not fit to serve as a scout leader and denied his request to accompany his son on a trip to the Philmont Scout Ranch in New Mexico.

Seabourn sued the Boy Scouts, charging that they violated the Kansas Act Against Discrimination.

And he lost.

The decision seems well grounded legally. Justice Robert E. Davis wrote in the unanimous decision that "relationships in scouting stand in stark contrast to retail or business-like establishments in that scouting relationships are continuous, close, personal and social and take place, more or less, outside of public view."

But regardless of what the law says the Scouts can do, they cannot look to the law for advice on what they should do.

And they should not discriminate against anyone for any reason.

It is precisely because scouting relationships are "continuous, close, personal and social" that inclusion is so important.

Scouting purports to teach life skills. So how are scouts to learn to deal with divergent belief systems if those people are not allowed to become members or leaders?

And if an organization teaching youth life skills also teaches them that it is OK to discriminate against people on the basis of their religious beliefs (or lack thereof), how will those youth learn to interact in society when they are older?

It is precisely because scouting relationships "take place, more or less, outside of public view" that they should strive to maintain a code of acceptance.

Again, it comes down to the idea that scouting teaches life skills. If our young people are taught that it is wrong to discriminate in government and on the job, but it is OK to discriminate behind closed doors, where the eyes of the world are kept out, what kind of society will they create when they are older?

If any organization believes it is bettering itself by excluding individuals from participation on the basis of ideology rather than ability, it will never reach its potential.

I feel for Seabourn. I enjoyed the Boy Scouts in my younger days and understand the benefits that it can provide for both scout and scout leader.

But even more, I feel for the Boy Scouts of the Coronado Area Council. When their regional office decided to deny participation to a specific class of society, it is the youth who really lose out.

▶ INTOLERANCE

Intolerance comes from all sides

Dear editor,

John Hart is right. As Deb Taylor wrote last Tuesday, "Hart hates the fact that we cry out when our wounds bleed and when we hurt." Exactly. Even though the Collegian views K-State as "one of the last bastions of open mindedness in America" (translation: one of the last refuges for flaming liberalism), the whining columns of Kevyn Jacobs and Deb Taylor are far from newsworthy.

This is especially true when one of the conditions they perceive as "hate" consists of someone wearing a T-shirt they find offensive, but which any reputable anatomy course would show to be factual. They make the mistake of assuming that because we disagree with a person, we hate them.

Call me heterosexist or homophobic if you like, but I am not going to whine over senseless name calling and blame all the problems in my life on everything from society to genetics — but never myself. I don't see any fellow heterosexuals writing on a weekly basis about why we are the way we are, we just deal with it. I accept that homosexuals are the way they are, but why do a select few need to use the Collegian to justify their behavior (and why does the Collegian allow them to)?

Some will accuse me of being intolerant just as Deb Taylor accused John Hart. This is not intolerance. It is simply a plea for decent journalism. Intolerance is complaining about what someone's T-shirt says.

The truth is that John Hart represents a much larger segment of the population than those who complain about him. This fact, of course, is the very basis of their complaints. If their opinion is not shared by everyone, then they are being discriminated against. Wrong. As Rush Limbaugh often says "They just don't get it." Perhaps when the representatives we elected (note: elected by the majority) start withdrawing support for groups with hollow intentions they will get it.

Take the Student Senate's cutting of funding for Metazine as a micro for example. The escalation of liberal whining will reach astronomical levels, and all the world will be blamed for all their hardships. Don't let 'em bother ya ladies and gentlemen.

A newspaper should not be a place for people to constantly outlet their frustrations and place blame on everyone else in order to make themselves feel better as they try and achieve a sense of security about their lifestyle. A little of that goes a long way and every Monday (plus extras like Tuesday) is excessive. If you want a forum for those purposes, join a support group — or maybe write to KU, and they'll put you in the Daily Kansan.

▶ UNION

Food service here needs support

Dear editor,

I want to commend the Union Food Service staff, which I understand is currently under threat of an economic hatchet, for their creative menus and preparations along the Mardi Gras theme.

"I lived in New Orleans for three years and was pleased to relive here in Kansas some of my experiences with Cajun cooking."

DON HEDRICK
professor of English

I lived in New Orleans for three years and was pleased to relive here in Kansas some of my experiences with Cajun cooking. It is all the more disturbing, given a University that supposedly has commitment to diversity and to broadening student experiences, to read of suggestions that such food service be taken over by homogeneous, corporate-franchise food that one can find in any mall.

It may seem little, but these little aspects of the University have a real, though indirect impact on our furthering or hindering our academic goals.

I think everyone at the University ought to support this local staff. It is time for everyone, especially in the administration of the Union to remember the actual charter of the Student Union, which states that its highest function is to serve the academic mission of the University — a purpose too often ignored.

Don Hedrick

▶ HOMOSEXUALITY

Column was way off mark

Dear editor,

One reason for having negative impressions about other people, that Kathleen Mastio may have missed in her March 13 column, is that people reading an article like hers might believe it to be factual. Some of Mastio's earlier Collegian articles site her sources of information and statistics indicating that she does care about credibility.

However, the recent article seems to throw out as fact that which has no basis in anything real.

Within the first third of the article, Mastio begins to use the pronouns "they," "us," "we" and "them." Depending on the reader, these words have different meanings but the context by which she uses them, Mastio clearly states her sexuality. Does she really need to tell the readers about her personal preference? Is that all she talks about? Is she shoving her rhetoric down the readers' throats?

If she were asked who she was and within her first 20 responses she talked about her family and it happened to be that she had a wife and a son, would she have identified herself by her sexuality by talking about her family, or would she have been communicating a committed relationship, which is a vital part of her identity? Would it be different if it were a husband and a son? When she requests that her son's public school not teach him that his family is "bad" while his friends' families are "good," is that part of her family commitment, or is it her hidden agenda?

It would be interesting to know where the information about promiscuity comes from. When I lived in the residence halls at K-State, promiscuity was quite common for several residents who were on my floor. I don't know for sure who Mastio's "us" or "them" are, but by seeing who those residents brought to their rooms, most would have fallen into her "us" category. This convenient situation isn't even available to most of the gay people I know who apparently aren't the same people that Mastio knows.

"When I lived in the residence halls at K-State, promiscuity was quite common for several residents who were on my floor."

CORNELL KINDERKNECHT
K-State graduate

Although I think that people are more educated about diseases and precautions now than they were then, the amount of promiscuity and the proportion of "we" to "they" is probably about the same now as it was then.

For a good chuckle, reread Mastio's article and swap all the occurrences of "homo" and "hetero," as well as "gay" and "straight." For that matter, replace references with any group that you choose. It makes for some entertaining reading but certainly isn't any more or less credible. It definitely isn't true and isn't based on anything real.

The cross-dressing part doesn't seem to make much sense either way you read it, but does demonstrate the writer's imagination.

Just be glad that her article is on the "opinion" page and that she doesn't really speak for "us." Or is it "them?"

Cornell Kinderknecht
K-State graduate

Breaking up

One minute they're inseparable, sharing their most intimate thoughts and feelings – the next minute they are faces across a crowded room or polite acquaintances at best.

Story by Nikola Zytkow Art by Bill Kraai

Ah, the intriguing ritual of dating and breaking up has caused many a broken heart. Songs like "Breaking Up Is Hard To Do" and "I'm Gonna Wash That Man Right Outta My Hair" illustrate society's attitudes toward these dismal separations.

Jennifer Sterrett, junior in human development and family studies, said it took her some time to get over her severed relationship.

Sterrett said two years ago, she was engaged to a man she had dated for sixmonths.

"He told me he got a temporary job offer in London, and that he would be back," she said.

"He never called or came back," Sterrett said. "I got worried that something had happened to him."

But after calling his mother, Sterrett found out that he had gone back to Michigan to remarry his ex-wife, whom he had three kids with.

Sterrett said she had no idea he was divorced, let alone that he had three kids.

"I'm still pretty upset about it," she said, adding that confronting him about it over the phone helped a little.

Initially, she said she was very depressed and isolated herself in her room, crying and feeling sorry for herself.

But after that phase passed, another one took over.

"I drank a lot and ate a lot. I basically went out and tried to pick up as many men as possible," she said, adding that these were not sexual relationships.

On any given weekend, Sterrett said she could be found cruising Aggieville, windows down, yelling and winking at the men.

"If there was a man within a 50-mile radius willing to buy me a drink, I found him. I pretty much wanted to use men – no strings attached," she said.

The partying stage lasted for three to four months, and Sterrett said she came out of the whole experience all the wiser.

"I think it made me a lot smarter. Coming straight from a small town, I learned volumes about men. Men from smaller towns are more straight- forward," she said.

Tonya Brouhard, sophomore in interior design, said she came out of her recent relationship with a renewed sense of self.

"For the last five years, I've thought about me and him as a whole. Now I just think about me," Brouhard said.

"The hardest thing about it all was getting used to thinking about myself and not about the man," she said, adding that almost all her future plans revolved around him.

Brouhard said she thinks the best way to communicate to the other person that the relationship is over is by cutting it off completely.

At first it was hard not to pick up the phone, she said. But she said she had to remind herself of all the reasons why they should not get back together, and resist the temptation.

"It's not as easy to let go if you talk to them on a regular basis," she said.

But Brouhard said that is only part of the coping process. It's also important to have supportive friends.

"My mom and my friends helped a lot. I think I care more about having friends now. I feel like I even attract more friends," Brouhard said.

Brouhard said she thinks there are differences in the way men and women deal with breakups.

"Guys are more out for revenge," she said. "I felt he wanted to do whatever he could to get back at me."

But John Martinez, sophomore in pre-medicine, said he disagrees.

"Females can be really mean to the guys," he said, adding that it is the females who often seek out the revenge.

"I know some girls who try to hit on the guy's best friend after a breakup," Martinez said.

He did, though, admit that after the breakup of his relationship, he did go out quite a bit.

"I wanted to see if I still had it," he said, laughing.

When asked about the differences between the ways women cope with breakups compared to men, Martinez said he thought that guys try to act more nonchalant about the situation in front of their friends.

Bryan Caudillo, freshman in business, agreed.

"They don't want to show their softer side," he said. "They don't want to show that they're hurting."

It goes back to the whole macho thing, he said.

Caudillo, who was in a three-year relationship, said he thought his girlfriend got over the breakup quicker than he did.

"It was hard because it was like an important part of my life wasn't there anymore," he said. "There was an emptiness there."

He said that at the time he thought he'd never make it through and had thoughts of going out with other people to get back at his ex.

> "Guys are more out for revenge. I felt he wanted to do whatever he could to get back at me."
> TONYA BROUHARD
> Sophomore in interior design

But looking back on it, he said he's glad he didn't succumb to his impulses.

Revenge is not a good idea. The chances of getting back with that person get much slimmer if a person does something like that, Caudillo said.

Instead, he said he kept himself busy. To ensure that old memories wouldn't catch him off guard, he put all of his pictures of him and his ex into a box.

In "Rebuilding – When Your Relationship Ends," Bruce Fisher, a divorce therapist, discusses what he calls healthy terminations.

"Healthy terminations end with a fraction of the pain that could be there from trying to stretch the relationship into something it is not."

Fisher said openness and honesty are the best policies when dealing with a break-up.

Jill Livingston, senior in social work, said there is a certain element of control left in a break-up.

"It's harder for the person who gets broken up with," she said, adding that whoever breaks up with the other person has greater control.

"The adjustment process differs since dumpers feel more guilt and dumpees feel more rejection. Dumpers start their adjustment while still in the love relationship, but dumpees start adjusting later."

In her book, "Coming Apart," Daphne Rose Kingma, a marriage and family therapist, said there are a number of stages a person has to go through before he or she experiences resolution.

Kingma suggests following through with five exercises that should help one on their way to resolution.

The steps include writing out the story of the evolution of the relationship, dealing with the pain and anger by possibly writing a letter to the ex, expressing all those pent-up frustrations, writing a letter of appreciation for all the things you got out of the relationship, and creating a different role for the former partner in our lives.

"Now that it's over, now that you've gone through all the tearful, sorrowful, raging, self-blaming, blaming and forgiving feelings that compromise the emotional progression of ending a relationship, you have come a long way toward your emotional healing," Kingma said.

"Shoeless Joe" deserves to be in the Hall of Fame

MIKE BUNCH

There will be no joy in Mudville today or for a long time to come.

What has happened to the game that used to be called baseball?

Someone just take me back to the good old days of fun and hot dogs in the cheap seats.

Because owners and players have been on a kick since August (actually I think it stems back at least 25 years), I decided to do something for the sport.

Hopefully, this will be a weekly column about players from past days of glory. These are guys who played when baseball was just a game, the national pastime, and money wasn't everything.

I decided to start the series with my all-time favorite player, considered to be one of the best outfielders and hitters in the history of baseball.

Joseph Jefferson Jackson — "Shoeless Joe," is better known as that outfielder in the movie "Field of Dreams."

The nickname "Shoeless Joe" came from an incident in the minor leagues, when Jackson played a game without his shoes on. It stuck with him for the rest of his career.

A great hitter in an era that saw pitchers like Walter Johnson win 30 games a season, Jackson compiled fantastic offensive numbers backed by solid play in left field.

It is unfortunate that most people only remember Jackson for being banned from baseball for life in 1920 — a year after the 1919 World Series scandal.

The 1919 Chicago White Sox marched through the competition that season, sure to win the series. Instead, gamblers bribed seven members of the team to throw the series, and the "Black Sox" scandal was born.

Jackson's involvement in the scandal has never been proven beyond the fact that he probably knew what was going on with the others.

His play apparently wasn't affected during the series — he hit .375, including three doubles and a home run.

Considered by many players, managers and reporters to be the greatest natural hitter ever to play the game, Jackson was definitely a threat at the plate.

Even Babe Ruth complimented Jackson, saying he had copied Jackson's swing.

Playing 13 seasons before he was forced out in 1920, Jackson compiled numbers any player would envy.

In his first full season in pro ball, he hit .408 with 233 hits.

Couple that with 45 doubles, 19 triples and 83 RBI, and he had a fantastic year that should lead to the batting crown.

Unfortunately, Ty Cobb hit a career high .420 to edge Jackson out in the race.

Cobb edged him out again in 1912, a year that saw Jackson hit .395 with 226 hits, 44 doubles, 26 triples and 90 RBI.

Outplaying and outhitting a Hall-of-Famer like Cobb three years in a row (he lost the title to Cobb again in 1913), says much for Jackson's ability at the plate.

Jackson's career numbers are equally impressive.

He had a lifetime batting average of .356, third on the all-time list behind only Cobb (again) and Rogers Hornsby.

A low strikeout ratio is one of Jackson's most impressive statistics.

During an 11-year professional career, Jackson played in 1,330 games with 4,981 at-bats.

Jackson only struck out 158 times in his career.

This is an average of less than one strikeout in every 12 games, or three times for each 100 at-bats.

In his final season in the majors, his average was .382, with a career-high 12 home runs, 42 doubles and a league-leading 20 triples.

Those are Hall-of-Fame numbers.

I don't care what anyone says. Besides, the man was more than just numbers.

His personality made his popularity at the time greater than any other player's.

After being forcibly retired from the game, Jackson played in local leagues for a few years and then retired to South Carolina to run a liquor store. He died in 1951.

Jackson's stats prove he belongs in the Hall of Fame with the other greats of the game.

His play in the fabled series in 1919 doesn't reflect a guilty man, nor was it ever proven. It shouldn't be a factor, especially 76 years after the fact.

I think "Shoeless Joe" Jackson should be given his due. Recognition in the Hall is deservedly his and long overdue.

Hopefully, this column will be a release to days when baseball and people mattered.

There are so many greats of the game.

I hope to give a few of them recognition over the next few weeks.

Tracksters open outdoor season in Texas

K-State is ready to begin the 1995 outdoor season

WESS HUDELSON
Collegian

K-State opens its outdoor season today, and the team couldn't be more relieved.

Three athletes will compete in the College Station Heptathlon/Decathlon in College Station, Texas, on the Texas A & M University campus.

The rest of the squad will join the multi-event athletes on Friday and compete on Saturday.

"They are all real hungry to get outside," assistant coach Jill Lancaster said.

"After a long winter of training inside on the little track with tight curves, I think their bodies are really looking forward to the outdoor track."

Jill Montgomery and Gwen Wentland will compete in the heptathlon for K-State.

The duo captured the top two spots in the pentathlon at the Big Eight Indoor Track and Field Championships Feb. 24.

Wentland owned the top point total in the nation with a score of 4,115.

Montgomery tallied the second-highest total in the nation en route to winning the Big Eight title with a total of 4,093.

Both athletes competed at the NCAA Indoor Track and Field Championships in the high jump last Saturday in Indianapolis.

"I'm excited about the outdoor season," Wentland said.

"I'll be glad to have a little change of scenery."

Matt Jeffrey will compete in the decathlon for the Cats Thursday and Friday.

Travis Renner, who finished fifth in the Big Eight in the indoor pentathlon, will not compete, Lancaster said.

Lancaster said the team should improve with the addition of some outdoor events, such as the javelin.

"There's no doubt that the javelin will make us a better team," Lancaster said.

"We have dominated that event the past couple of seasons, especially on the women's side."

Kristen and Kirsten Schultz lead the javelin parade for the women.

Kristen garnered all-America honors as a sophomore last season with a fifth-place finish at the NCAA Outdoor Track and Field Championships.

Kirsten took first at the Big Eight Championships last season with a personal-best toss of 156 feet 11 inches.

"It's almost like waiting for Christmas," Kirsten said.

"We've only thrown hard two or three times, so I'm really curious to see what I can do."

The discus could be a strong event for the men, Lancaster said.

Red-shirt freshman Ryan Manning will get his first chance to compete as a member of the K-State track team.

The Norton native finished second in the 3A State Championships with a toss of 181'7".

Starting his outdoor career, Jeff Martin will compete in the 400-meter hurdles.

Martin collected state titles in the 300-meter hurdles and the 400 meters during his high-school career at Lakin.

The team will stay in San Marcos, Texas, during the week and compete in the Southwest Texas Invitational March 25.

Culp not wasting opportunities

LUKE WEHRMAN
Collegian

A former K-State baseball player is getting his crack at major league baseball.

Former Cats' catcher Brian Culp is at spring training in Tucson, Ariz., with the Colorado Rockies. Because to the major league baseball strike, Culp is one of the many minor league baseball players called upon to help resume professional baseball.

Despite getting a chance to play in the major leagues, Culp said playing under these kind of circumstances isn't the way he wanted to break into the big leagues.

Before being called up to replace striking players, Culp said he spent two seasons playing A and AA baseball for the Rockies' organization.

Culp said he doesn't necessarily agree with the owners using replacement players in order to resume play.

"The owners are out to break the union," Culp said.

He said he has sympathy for the striking players.

As for now, Culp said he is ready for the season to begin.

"I can't wait to play in a game," Culp said.

K-State baseball coach Mike Clark said Culp has the offensive tools to play in the major leagues.

"Offensively, he is an excellent hitter," Clark said.

Since becoming a player in the Rockies' minor-league system, Culp said he has been either playing catcher or one of the outfield positions.

Clark said this is a good opportunity for Culp.

"It's an excellent opportunity for him to get a good look," Clark said.

Clark said he has talked to the Rockies' organization and has heard nothing but good things about Culp.

"He had a great year last year," Clark said.

Culp said it may be a good opportunity for him but he wants to be judged next to the real professionals.

"I want the coaches to judge me along with major-league players," Culp said.

Gordon looks ready for the big time

ASSOCIATED PRESS

How good can Jeff Gordon get?

"The sky's the limit," said team owner Rick Hendrick, who plucked the now 23-year-old racer out of the Busch Grand National series a little more than two years ago.

"The first time I saw him race, I didn't even know the name, but I knew he was something special," Hendrick said.

Now, everybody knows that.

The youngster, known to some in Winston Cup racing as "Wonderboy," is making his mark in NASCAR's elite stock-car series.

Gordon, who posted more than 500 short-track victories before the age of 20, moved to stocks in 1991, winning the Grand National rookie title.

The next year, he won three Busch races and a series-record 11 poles and earned his Winston Cup shot from Hendrick.

He seems to waste little time on anything.

He quickly proved he belonged at the top level of the sport with seven top-five finishes, including a pair of seconds and his first Winston Cup pole.

Not surprisingly, he was the 1993 Rookie of the Year.

Last season was the breakthrough year for Gordon, with wins in the Coca-Cola 600 at Charlotte and the inaugural Brickyard 400 at Indianapolis, the richest race in stock-car history.

So far this year, Gordon has two poles and two wins in four races, including Sunday's Purolator 500 at Atlanta Motor Speedway, where he overwhelmed the field.

Dale Jarrett, who is 38 and has one fewer Winston Cup victories than Gordon, said, "It should be illegal to be that young, that good looking and that talented."

Jarrett was only half joking.

Gordon, who recently married Brooke Sealey, a former Miss Winston, can hardly believe his good fortune.

After Sunday's race, he pondered his situation and concluded: "Life is good."

But the term superstar is a weight the 5-foot-7, 150-pound isn't sure he wants to carry around.

"What is a superstar? What makes him tick?" Gordon asked.

"Michael Jordan, to me, is a superstar, and I'm no Michael Jordan," he said.

"All I can say is that if it is possible to take NASCAR up to the next level — with the NFL and the NBA — I want to help be part of that."

Ray Evernham, Gordon's crew chief, is his driver's biggest fan.

"He's got the natural talent, and he can go as far as he wants to go," Evernham said. "I saw a lot of great drivers when I worked as a mechanic at IROC, but he's got as much natural talent as any of them."

Gordon looked a little bemused as he sat next to Evernham, listening to the praise.

He glanced over at his wife, beaming a smile that showed she certainly agreed with the crew chief.

"I don't know about natural talent or anything like that," Gordon said.

"I don't think about any of that. I just go out there and do the job that I enjoy doing for a living. All I know is I've been racing since I was 5 years old. I've been in a race car, holding the steering wheel, putting my feet on pedals."

Blue gets a case of spring fever

Dear Cassie,

I have always been a pretty good student, and I like the classes I am taking this semester. I have always prided myself on being able to get things done when others can't. But lately, my concentration has been wavering, and I just can't seem to get into my work the way I used to. I have noticed my friends are going through the same thing. I am graduating soon and really need to come out of this semester with a high GPA. What's wrong with me? I don't feel sick. Am I? What can I do? Guide me!

Signed, Blue

Dear Blue,

There isn't anything wrong with you but a good case of spring fever. All of us go through it. Until you can go on spring break there is very little you can do.

My advice to you is to take frequent study breaks and just be crazy. Run around nekkid in a dandelion patch, go window shopping in Wal-Mart, just enjoy the spring weather (who knows how long it will be here). But don't forget to go back to your studies. Balance is the key.

Good luck.

Signed, Cassie

Coctails add diverse music to Berlin show

MIKE HILL
Collegian

A saxophone and cello took the place of guitars and vocals as the Chicago based group, The Coctails, took the stage at Berlin Tuesday night.

Opening for the Coctails were Manhattan's Sufferbus and Lawrence's Panel Donor.

Sufferbus started the night off with a shortened set because of early problems with the sound system.

"We're going to play punk-rock versions of all our songs because we only have 30 minutes," the group said.

Panel Donor played next. With the lead singer's harsh vocals and lots of loud guitar, the 40 to 50 patrons were quickly on their feet and right in front of the stage.

Panel Donor gave everyone little time to relax with their numerous tempo changes and continuous music.

The Coctails then went on for one of the last shows on their current tour.

"This tour started in Seattle and has gone down the West Coast through Arizona and Texas, and now we're on our way home," cellist Mark Greenberg said.

The Coctails consider themselves to be an original group, but they said they take bits and pieces from numerous bands.

"There's a lot of groups we get inspiration from, like Devo and the Velvet Underground," Greenberg said.

John Upturch, saxophone player for the Coctails, said the Coctails play a wide variety of music.

"We play stuff ranging from jazz to rock to pop to folk and gray areas in between," Upturch said.

Greenberg said the group got together to play at an art show six years ago.

"The idea was to be background music," he said.

The Coctails have released four full-length albums and have started their own recording label named Hi-Ball Records.

Greenberg said the band is going to be doing a show in Japan when they finish up their current tour.

"We get some radio play over there, so we are going to play one show to probably about three hundred people," he said.

The Coctails took the stage with their large variety of instruments, which included a saxophone, cello and numerous percussion instruments.

Their style was different from the previous bands of the night.

They played instrumental pieces using the diverse instruments to make slower ballads or more upbeat tunes.

David Runser, senior in civil engineering, said he found the Coctails to be a nice change.

"I like their uniqueness. They're really in control," Runser said.

Sia Rezvani, KU student, agreed.

"They make music whatever they want it to be," Rezvani said.

Church service depicted in play

NIKOLA ZYTKOW
Collegian

Hands were a-clappin', fingers a-snappin', and an occasional amen could be heard Wednesday evening as the Purple Masque Theatre was transformed into a North Carolina church house, with the audience as the congregation.

The second evening performance of "Smoke on the Mountain" was welcomed by a sellout crowd almost as lively as the performers themselves.

The play, which takes place on a Saturday night in June 1938, is exceptionally well-written. But it is the performers who bring every scene to life with their jubilant gospel songs and excellent, humorous timing.

The Sanders family, invited by the Rev. Mervin Oglethorpe, played by Doug Hurley, to sing a few numbers for the congregation, takes center stage and leaves Oglethorpe in the pews with the flock.

They have Mount Pleasant Baptist Church captivated with personal tales each character so eagerly divulges.

June Sanders, played by Becky Rabenseifner, said she can't sing but instead signs to the voices of her family. Not to worry that everyone in the congregation can hear just fine — she said she needs the practice.

Denese Sanders, played by Linda Nyhart, has a classically beautiful voice, which is a great advantage in her hilarious solo, "I'll Never Die (I'll Just Change My Address)."

But Denese has more to reveal to the audience than just her sweet voice. She has hopes to be a movie star one day soon, and against the pleas of her horrified parents, she tells the audience of her audition for the role of Scarlett in "Gone With the Wind."

Yet another impressive performance is delivered by Vera, played by Vivian Ferguson. Ferguson is a powerful presence on the stage not only because of her voice as she sings "No Tears In Heaven," but because of her convincing portrayal of a devoted wife and strong Southern woman who runs her family according to the Gospel.

When Oglethorpe finally has a chance to interject, he does a terrific job, showing Dennis, played by Erik Hogan, precisely how to hold the Bible in one hand while raising the other, to get that effect – the perfect preacher pose.

But Oglethorpe's glory is short-lived. After getting in a few announcements and scriptures, the Sanders family steals the show.

"Would Jesus mind if we put a little swing into it?" the group asks Oglethorpe, who looks fairly flustered by now, hoping the music is not too risqué for the churchgoers.

But the Sanders family is up there having fun and feeling rather frisky as they go into a lively performance of "Christian Cowboy."

Clad in cowboy boots and riding their imaginary horses, Dennis and Denese lead off the rest of their family, galloping on the stage.

Burl Sanders, played by T. Scott Steel, starts his story by telling the people about everything and anything from the new porch he just built to the proud fact that he doesn't sell beer in the family filling station.

Stanley, played by Brent Jackson, performed "Everyone Home But Me," a song with some of the funniest lyrics in the show.

By the time the second act rolled around, Oglethorpe had fully given up on his sermon, loosened up his collar and grabbed a miniature banjo. He was fully caught up in the moment of what would probably be one of the wildest nights his little congregation would ever see.

It was also one of the liveliest and best performances the Purple Masque Theatre has ever seen.

Anderson project puts garage on hold

President Jon Wefald said because of the delayed Anderson Avenue expansion, in a best-case scenario, the parking garage will be built in 1999.

"It puts everything on a back burner," Wefald said.

However, the University's five-year capital-improvements plan, which is submitted to the Kansas Board of Regents every spring, will still include the proposed parking garage in an unspecified location, Wefald said.

"As we speak, I think the majority of people that were asked felt there should be a garage," Wefald said.

But, Wefald said, there is plenty of time to consider all options concerning the parking garage.

John Riedel, parking chair for Student Senate, said with the extra time available, it will be possible to get more student feedback.

Riedel said he hopes there will be a student vote.

be the best choice for their situation.

"It shows you the real panic people get into when their options are few," Jaimee Demby, sophomore in social work, said.

The goal of the game is to make the correct decision by deadline and get out of poverty. The status of poverty is determined by a point system.

The game is designed so one in 12 teams gets out of the cycle of poverty, Shulman said.

"As in life, decisions need to be made in a timely manner or you will suffer the consequences," he said.

Students taking part in the poverty-simulation game said they had feelings of frustration, helplessness and limited options.

"Those feelings are very real for people in poverty," Shulman said.

Some students were tempted to choose the option of illegal activities to free themselves from poverty.

Other options to escape poverty included seeking help from an agency, borrowing money from friends, selling food stamps for cash or letting the landlord evict the family and moving to a homeless shelter.

"I don't think you can really understand poverty until you have been there. The game helps because there are a lot of tough decisions you have to make," Kacy Sawyer, freshman in psychology, said.

Feminist label brings bad image

SARA SMITH

Feminism has changed a lot from the days of suffrage and bra burning.

Although women now have more legal rights than ever, the word feminism itself has picked up some baggage along the way.

Stephanie Trembley, freshman in speech and pre-law, said she sometimes thinks of feminists as radicals.

WOMEN'S HISTORY MONTH

"A lot of people won't call themselves feminists because of the bad connotations," Trembley said.

Jack Taylor, graduate student in political science, said he thinks feminists have been labeled as extremists.

"One reason I think there are bad connotations is because people associate feminism with a radical attitude that all men are bad and all men should be burned, or something like that," said Taylor, who calls himself a feminist.

However, Taylor said he thinks a lot of women who don't want to assume the feminist label are in fact feminists.

"If you feel you want equal pay, if you feel women should have more representation in government, then you're a feminist," he said.

Taylor said he thinks narrow-mindedness has contributed to the negative associations with the word.

"It's only a threat to narrow-minded people," he said. "Anyone's who's against feminism is just not looking at all the issues."

Taylor also said there were other reasons peo-

Senate votes against garage

AMY SIMON

Student Governing Association decided it did not favor a parking garage, especially if it is built in Memorial Stadium.

Senate considered two parking resolutions at Thursday's meeting.

The first resolution, which failed, supported the idea of a parking garage in general. It also said students, faculty and staff should be considered in the final decision on the location.

John Riedel, parking and campus safety chair, said 43.8 percent of students favored the parking garage as the best solution to the parking problem when filling out the parking survey last semester.

The planned expansion of Anderson Hall will also take away spaces in the Union lot, Riedel said. However, Paul Friedrichs, agriculture senator, said the city council voted down this expansion project at its last meeting.

"Right now, I feel there is a parking problem, and I urge you to vote for the parking garage as the best solution," Riedel said.

Philip Mudd, architecture senator, said funding

From humble beginnings to the top of the charts, country stars Kix Brooks and Ronnie Dunn's lives read like

A COUNTRY SONG

NIKOLA ZYTKOW
Collegian

Brooks & Dunn, country music's top touring attraction, is coming once again to grace Bramlage Coliseum with its down-home style and feisty musical appeal.

Kix Brooks, in a phone interview, said he is excited about coming back to Kansas to perform.

"After the first 50 to 60 songs, all of our life experiences were used up."

KIX BROOKS
Member of the duo Brooks and Dunn

The duo performed at Bramlage last April in front of a crowd of 8,600 people.

Brooks said it is this kind of large crowd that gets him going onstage. Everything from the fans cheering to people asking him for autographs gets him into the performance mode and keeps him going through the group's 100-city nationwide tour, he said.

The group, which already has eight No. 1 singles and three albums under its belt, has been in the spotlight since August 1991.

Brooks said his humble beginnings in Shreveport, La., keep him so down-to-earth and appreciative of the support of their fans.

He said he had many years of playing small-town gigs and trying to make a name for himself.

"We've had lots of humbling experiences. We both had failed record deals," Brooks said.

Even then, Brooks said he loved performing. In fact, he said, it's always been a part of his and Dunn's lives.

Brooks said he recalls putting on plays and entertaining the family even as a young boy.

"We both came from real musical families," Brooks said. "My father was a country fan."

Among his and Dunn's early musical influences were names like Hank Williams, Johnny Horton and Merle Haggard.

"Merle is the king," Brooks said.

He went on to add Eric Clapton, the Eagles and the Rolling Stones to the list of influences, joking that the Stones might be the reason why Brooks and Dunn get a little too wild on guitar every once in a while.

The first song that the duo wrote together was "My Next Broken Heart." Brooks said it didn't take long to write it.

"It took an afternoon," he said.

He said they sat around together and juggled ideas about broken hearts and people who go from one broken heart right into the next.

But ideas don't always come together so swiftly for these guys, who write a majority of the songs themselves.

"After the first 50 to 60 songs, all of our life experiences were used up," Brooks said.

The inspiration for the songs comes from everywhere. Brooks said various situations

Hi-tech Brooks and Dunn beer truck scoots into town

KRISTIN BRIGHTON
Collegian

It's coming, and it's going to be loud.

As an effort to increase visibility for the March 25 concert, the Brooks and Dunn video truck will be making a stop at Silverado Saloon tonight and Saturday.

The truck is a 10-bay beer truck carrying a 40-inch video monitor, a 6,000-watt professional audio-visual system and a complete disc jockey booth — all of which is devoted to the country duo.

The truck will be in operation from 8:30 to 11 p.m. tonight and Saturday from 5:30 to 8 p.m. A visit to the truck is free of charge.

Miller Lite is sponsoring the tour and the truck, which normally travels with the concert but is currently off its set schedule, Monty Pyle, promotions director for Heartland Beverage, said.

KTPK-FM 106.9 will be doing a live remote from the truck, and prizes such as tickets, passes and T-shirts will be given away, Pyle said.

The truck also features a karaoke system. Pyle said anyone who participates in the singing of a Brooks and Dunn song through karaoke can keep a tape of their performance.

Besides being a showcase of memorabilia, the truck will be stacked with merchandise for sale, including T-shirts, prior to the show, Pyle said.

Booking the truck to a smaller community is rare, Pyle said.

"Smaller areas seem to miss out on things like this," he said, adding that larger areas usually keep similar promotions too long.

He said he is a little worried about the noise with apartments nearby but believes it will be enjoyable.

"It's going to be kind of fun," Pyle said.

Pyle said ticket sales for the concert have been low, which he attributes to the concert being booked during spring break.

Brooks and Dunn will play at 8 p.m. March 25 at Bramlage Coliseum. Call the Bramlage ticket office at 532-7606 for tickets. The price is $20.

New Rec Center entrance to open Monday

SARAH LUNDAY
Collegian

When students return from spring break, they will be able to stroll through the front entrance at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex.

The opening of the new entrance will take place Monday during regular business hours.

Raydon Robel, director of recreational services, said what is most impressive about the new entryway is what people begin to see when they get inside.

"People will have an opportunity to get the feel of what the building's going to look like," Robel said.

Students will be able to check out equipment and show identification in the new area, said Derek Walters, assistant director and facility manager of recreational services.

Walters said the entryway opens into a large open space that goes east to west.

"It will be a nice surprise when people get back," he said.

Also, the new administration offices will be ready at the time of opening, Walters said.

Robel said one of the reasons the new entryway is opening during spring break is to keep construction on schedule.

"We're still on-line and shooting for the middle of June for total completion," Robel said.

Site construction at the complex began in August.

The weight room and fitness area are scheduled to open by the end of April, Robel said. Final completion of the complex is still scheduled for this summer.

The completed complex will include new weight and fitness areas, new administrative offices, a multipurpose room, a track and a resource room.

Teresa Daniel, sophomore in business, said she is looking forward to the completion because she has heard so much talk about how great it is going to be.

Daniel goes to the complex three times a week and uses both levels to work out. She said it is usually crowded, but between 9 and 11 p.m., it is packed.

She said she hopes there will be more area with the new opening.

Steve Fuhrman, junior in agronomy, said the opening of the new entrance doesn't make much of a difference to him, but the exterior of the building looks really good.

Walters said what is most important to remember is that the complex is for K-State.

"It is something I think the students will enjoy and get a lot of use out of," he said.

The complex has an average of 2,000 users a day.

▶ PROJECT SAFE ZONE ENCOURAGES ALLIES TO DISPLAY PINK TRIANGLES

Project Safe Zone might make it easier for K-State's homosexuals and bisexuals to find friendly environments next fall.

Project Safe Zone is a national program that allows people to express their support for homosexuals and bisexuals by hanging a pink triangle on a door or window.

A pink triangle is the recognized symbol of homosexuals and bisexuals.

Project Safe Zone is ready to be introduced to K-State, said Frank Axell, graduate adviser of Bisexual and Gay and Lesbian Society.

K-State's Project Safe Zone has been in the planning for about a year, Axell said.

BGLS asked Student Senate for funding of the program last spring, Susan Scott, associate dean of student life, said.

Axell said the funding was not hard to get because BGLS is a campus group sanctioned by Student Governing Association. Project Safe Zone was part of the BGLS proposal for 1994-95 funding.

The project was to be started when a study of the concerns of homosexuals and bisexuals at K-State was released, he said.

However, although the survey was released in October, the group decided to wait until next fall to begin the project.It was decided that the program should not start in full force until the fall semester, Scott said.

"Everyone is just interested in survival at this time," Scott said. "Advertising of the program will begin in the fall."

"We wanted to make it K-State-specific," Axell said. "We wanted to make it something we can be proud of."

He said K-State's pink triangle has Willie the Wildcat standing on it.

K-State's Project Safe Zone also incorporates comments and responses from the study, Axell said.

The statement on the pink triangle's card goes beyond stating that the displayer is an ally to homosexuals and bisexuals, Axell said.

Specifically, a person displaying the triangle is pledging to fight to heterosexist and homophobic statements, Axell said.

SGA, the dean of student life office and BGLS will provide a pink triangle to any interested person, Axell said.

▶ NEW CAMPUS CYCLING CLUB WELCOMES AREA MOUNTAIN, ROAD RIDERS

Dust off the bicycle and get ready to ride.

K-State now has a cycling club.

"It's for anyone who wants to get involved," said Dave Harrison, sophomore in civil engineering and president of the K-State Cycling Club.

Harrison said he saw the need to start a cycling club because there are many people in Manhattan who ride, but there is no organization.

Harrison said he wanted to take part in various races in and around the Kansas area, but he couldn't find the riders to travel to the races with him.

"I didn't want to drive across Kansas alone," Harrison said. "This is a way to get organized."

Harrison said the cycling club will set up weekend trips to races in the area.

Weekly rides are also planned.

"We will organize weekly recreational rides of varying length," Harrison said.

Bill Stolte, junior in wildlife biology, said it will be a good way to get a big group of people out riding together.

Stolte said he is part of a club in Topeka that rides together regularly.

Harrison said the cycling club will set up rides for both mountain bikes and road bikes.

For those interested in joining the K-State Cycling Club, there will be an informational meeting at 7 p.m. March 30 in Union 208.

"We're hoping to involve the whole community," Harrison said.

▶ SENATE COMMITTEE EXAMINES BILL TO ELIMINATE SCHOOL MILL LEVY

TOPEKA (AP) — The Senate Assessment and Taxation Committee has taken up a bill that would eliminate the state's 35-mill tax levy for public schools.

Senate Majority Leader Jerry Moran, R-Hays, appeared before the committee in support of his bill to abolish the statewide levy and replace it with an increase in sales and income taxes.

The bill would not affect local mill levies. Local officials would continue to appraise property and collect property taxes.

"Study after study shows that property tax is the most hated, most detested tax," Moran said.

He said because of the 1992 school-finance law, which imposed the statewide mill levy, all Kansans must worry about what other taxing districts do in terms of granting exemptions to businesses from property taxes.

He also said the state's property-tax system puts it at a disadvantage with surrounding states, particularly Missouri, in attracting and retaining businesses.

Under the bill, the state's 4.9-percent sales tax would increase to 6 percent.

"I know there is a concern that this bill is a funding of rural schools with city dollars," Moran said.

But he told the committee the present school-finance formula already does the same thing.

▶ BOARD OF REGENTS

Faculty evaluations will include surveys about perceptions

ANGIE STUMP
Collegian

TOPEKA — The Kansas Board of Regents approved the implementation of a student survey of faculty perception to be attached to fall 1995 faculty evaluations.

The independent survey will be attached to current evaluations. The data collected will be confidential and reviewed by the regents and staff. Faculty members will not know how an individual student evaluates their techniques.

"This will be the student's perception of their education," Audrey Nogle, student advisory committee, said. "I don't think it will be hard to implement."

The board was updated on the latest Kansas legislative actions on the appropriation bill.

"The actions of the House were three-fold," said Ray Hauke, director of planning and budget for the board.

The House deleted salary increases and put them into a separate bill.

The second thing they did was use spring 1994 tuition estimates rather than fall 1994. The difference was $5.8 million higher than Gov. Bill Graves' recommendations.

The third major item deleted was a base-budget reduction of $446,870 from the Cooperative Extension Program.

The bill is currently being discussed in the Senate Ways and Means Committee.

"The Senate recommendations are much more favorable to the institutions," Hauke said.

"There is one big difference," he said. "The Senate recommendation is funded with money that is there, and the House recommendation is financed by $5.8 million that isn't really there due to decreased enrollment."

After the bill passes committee it will then go to the Senate floor.

The regents discussed the need for student and alumni involvement in legislative matters.

K-State President Jon Wefald said the regents universities need to develop a full-court press by educating the alumni, faculty and students about the issues.

"We need the doctors or lawyers from the small towns in Kansas to talk to their legislators about their concerns in regard to higher education," Wefald said.

Senate doesn't want garage in stadium and other issues must be considered in this decision.

"We can't give the administration a blank check and tell them to get the money where they want," Mudd said.

The resolution failed by a vote of 23-23-0. The second resolution opposed the parking garage being built in Memorial Stadium.

David Winkler, human ecology senator, said that putting a parking garage in Memorial Stadium desecrates the stadium dedicated to World War I veterans.

"The memorial was meant to stay intact at least as long as the life of those people who fought in the war," Winkler said.

Jeff Peterson, student body president, said opposing this location would limit the committee in trying to find the most economical solution to the parking problem.

The resolution passed 29-19-0.

In other business, Michelé Meier, business senator, said the parking council decided to raise meter rates to 50 cents instead of 75 cents beginning in July. Visitors to Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex will also have to pay 50 cents.

MIKE BUNCH

Western Flyer took the crowd at TW Longhorn's for a wild ride on the country side Wednesday night.

The free concert was sponsored by B 104.7, Briggs Jeep-Eagle, direct Maytag and DK Variety Donuts.

Perfect Stranger, on the Pacific Records label, was the opening act for Step One Records recording artist Western Flyer.

Perfect Stranger opened the show at 8 p.m. and captured the crowd's attention from the start.

The group just released its first album, and B 104.7 was the first radio station in the country to play it on the air.

The band played up to the crowd, performing some songs off its new album as well as several big country hits.

After Perfect Stranger left the stage, the band members signed autographs, met with the fans in the back of the bar and watched Western Flyer perform.

Returning to Manhattan, Western Flyer is touring the country to promote the latest single, "Cherokee Highway," from its self-titled album.

"This is the first single we are pushing strong in the college market," Danny Myrick, lead singer and bassist, said. "We are trying to get it on the air and get coverage with the REM crowd."

"Cherokee Highway" is a story about the friendship of two young boys, one white and one black, and racism that cost them their lives in the Mississippi delta region in 1961.

"The success happened with the nature of the song," Myrick said. "We were invited to play at the Martin Luther King Jr. birthday bash. They heard the song and asked us to come and play. We were the first country act to play at this celebration."

When Western Flyer performed it halfway through the show, the crowd cheered and sang along with the group.

The six-member band includes Myrick; Chris Marion, keyboards and vocals; Bruce Gust, drums; T.J. Klay, harmonica and mandolin; Steve Charles, lead guitar and vocals; and Roger Helton, acoustic guitar, banjo and dobro.

A unique feature to a group this size was the excellent harmonies.

The harmonies were apparent in their second single, "She Should Have Been Mine," a song about losing a first love.

A smooth instrumental line drove the tight harmonies and moved much of the crowd to dance, sway in time and sing along to the contagious melody.

"We all got together at Chris' house one night and started singing," Myrick said. "The harmonies were the first thing that really happened for us. We were fortunate in that respect."

Myrick said the band likes Kansas, Journey and several other

TOLES

Facing challenges can overcome mediocrity, conformity

JEREMY STEPHENS

As the Big Dance approaches once again, I often think about the futility of some of the games played.

Florida International is making its first appearance in the tournament. It will meet UCLA in the first round — the same UCLA everyone in the sports world is verbally fondling. Florida International has had the worst record in the NCAA tournament since 1961.

So why even play the game? In all reality, it's not a question of who is going to win, but by how many. It comes down to the determination that is highly visible in the sports world but often hard to come by in a lot of other places.

This kind of opposition provides the perfect opportunity to go out with a bang, but then again it's better than sitting at home and being threatened by pizza commercials. The coach of the FIU Golden Panthers, Bob Weltlich, knows what it's like to be on both sides of the court. He was an assistant with Bob Knight in 1976 when a powerful Indiana team went 32-0. He recently said, "I'm probably the only guy who knows what it's like to be the No. 1 team going in and the No. 64 team going in." I believe him.

He also knows just how long of a shot he has. With a touch of sarcasm, he said, "We're a 16 seed, but we're a strange 16 seed. We're like the 250th team in a 64-team field." I'll buy that too.

However, that's more than what a hundred other teams can say, because they weren't even asked to go. He didn't think he'd be here either. He announced his resignation in January and is as surprised as anyone else that his 11-18 Panthers are even here.

So what causes a team to show up and play hard, knowing very well that it's not going to be pretty? Winston Churchill said it best during a famous speech he delivered at a small college in Missouri: "Never, ever give up." This may seem obvious, but how many people live by this mantra?

The determination required to stand out in the crowd and refuse to conform, no matter how great the pressure, is hard to come by these days. If Florida International walks out on the court already conformed to the idea that it is going to lose, the game is already over before it started, and they will have no chance of an upset.

This same determination does not only apply to the world of sports but to every other area as well.

Successful people did not become successful by doing what everyone else did.

By definition, you cannot stand out in the crowd if you are doing exactly what the crowd is doing.

Steve Jobs, the founder of Apple Computers, did not become successful by going along with the crowd. By doing things differently than everyone else and staying one step ahead through a commitment to improvement, his computer company now provides major competition for IBM and its clones.

Successful political leaders also have the determination to do things differently than everyone else.

Successful political leaders also have the determination to do things differently than everyone else. The GOP's ascension to power in last year's elections could be attributed to their stand on issues that had long been considered taboo by the governing elite. Although reducing the increases in the budget (the budget hasn't actually been cut yet) and making government smaller haven't been in vogue for 40 years, the GOP is standing firm on their promises.

Not to ignore their colleagues across the aisle, Bill Clinton is definitely not one to conform either. While his actions sometimes approach illegality, such as Whitewater, he is definitely not a conformist.

However, conformity is no different than non-conformity if one does not take the time to examine what one believes and why. Paul, in writing to the Romans concerning their persecution, said, "Do not conform to the standards of this world, but be transformed through the renewing of your mind."

Without having a set of absolutes to stand on, it is next to impossible to stand firm and avoid conformity.

Conformity is a choice.

Think about it.

▶ HOMOSEXUALITY

We need a heterosexual column

Dear editor,

I'm not a student at K-State this semester, but I expect to be one next fall. I hope that when I enroll, I can convince the Collegian staff to let me write a weekly column on being a lonely heterosexual man.

I'll tell you what I'm going to write about. I'm going to write that being a lonely heterosexual man is everybody's fault but my own. I am going to write as a lonely heterosexual man I am a part of an oppressed few and deserve special consideration in the eyes of women and the law. And I'm going to write that if any one of my readers chooses to exercise their First Amendment right to wear or say something that degrades me as a lonely heterosexual man, they're bad people who deserve the scorn of the masses. In short, I will write about the depth of my shame.

Thankfully, this is not how my life really is.

True, I am single and heterosexual, but I don't have a complex about it as this scenario would make you think.

True, my life isn't all roses, but a person can whine about life or live it. I choose to live it.

I'm sure I would be laughed right out of Kedzie Hall if I honestly suggested a column like this. Yet, it seems like every Monday we hear about the plight and oppression of homosexuals everywhere through the pen of Kevyn Jacobs.

He would have us believe that his sexual orientation isn't his fault — that he didn't choose to be homosexual. He would have us believe that expressions of peace, love and harmony deserve to be heard and to hell with the rest. He would have us believe that the heterosexual community as a whole ganged up on him on "persecuted" him and those like him.

This is crap, and I think he knows it.

I respect Jacobs' First Amendment freedom to write what he wants — but I think he is wasting his time. The point my example tried to make is this: the same readership that doesn't give a damn whether or not I have a girlfriend or not doesn't give a damn what he does in private or whom he does it with.

Perhaps it would behoove Jacobs to examine what's really turning in our minds and use his column to talk about those issues. But if he chooses not to do that, he should remember that the universe doesn't revolve around him and that the majority still sets the standards.

▶ GREEKS

Greeks are just like everyone else

Dear editor,

I have a problem with the article "Dating a Greek from the Outsider's Point of View" in the Greek Life section of the March 8 Collegian.

This article is clearly ignorant. Even the title is offensive. An outsider's point of view? I am a "non-greek," as you call it — am I an outsider? My friends, or most of them anyway, are in sororities or fraternities and are dating a greek. When I go out with my friends, they don't introduce me and say "she's not in a house." It's just not that important.

I also can't understand why this girl thinks that these guys are rude on the phone because she is not in a house. I hate to break it to her, but guys are not nice on the phone. I don't think this girl's problem has anything to do with the fact that she's not in a house. I think it is her attitude toward the greek system. If you present a bad vibe toward the greeks, or anyone for that matter, why would they be nice?

Oh, and by the way, where I live has absolutely nothing to do with being greek. I live in Ford. Am I more likely to be friends with greeks? Maybe if you gave them a chance, you'd realize that, greek or not, we're all just the same.

▶ BOY SCOUTS

Scouts should remain religious

Dear editor,

I feel that I must stand up in defense of the Boy Scouts of America. Since its foundation, the Boy Scouts has helped to develop the moral, physical and mental attributes of America's male youths. They have worked to develop these attributes based on Christian beliefs.

While I understand Brad Seabourn's desire to attend the trip to Philmont with his son, I must also say that the actions of the Boy Scouts were well within their legal and moral rights.

I am a member of the Boy Scouts and have been since I was in the 5th grade. The thing I enjoyed most about the campouts was the multi-denominational Christian camp-wide church services held on Sunday mornings.

One of the things that holds the Boy Scouts together is its standards of what is right for Boy Scouts as a whole.

These standards were in place long before myself or Dan Lewerenz considered being in Scouts.

At a glance I would have said the same for Seabourn, but based on his service to the Collegian, I would assume that he may have actually been there at the beginning of it all.

The Boy Scouts of America have fought long and hard to stay a religiously based institution. I have a question for both of you, Lewerenz and Seabourn. Is it discriminatory for a church to allow only Christian, Jewish or Satanistic worship within its walls?

It's just as ludicrous to say that the Boy Scouts are being discriminatory.

▶ UPC

"Free Your Mind" a success

Dear editor,

I would like the Collegian and the rest of the campus to commend the UPC for putting on one heck of a week in "Free Your Mind Week."

Having done some campus programming in the past, I know how hard it is to bring quality events to K-State. The UPC has done just that.

I know that the guitarist on Monday, Edgar Cruz, was unbelievable. I was there. Additionally, I've heard good things about the comedians on March 9, the storyteller on Monday, and the Timothy Leary lecture Tuesday night.

We should all thank UPC's multicultural committee for really setting a precedent for quality programming here at KSU.

Well done!

▶ HOMOSEXUALITY

Column isn't factual

Dear editor,

As officers of K-State's Bisexual and Gay and Lesbian Society, we offer these responses to Kathleen Mastio's column:

Mastio, the next time you wish to look at "Mainstream America" as the source of people's fear of gays and lesbians, we suggest you pick a truly mainstream source. The "Village Voice" is a New York-Greenwich Village paper that is very liberal and very "New York" and hardly represents mainstream homosexual rhetoric.

Why not look to Manhattan? Here, you will find articles written by thoughtful homosexuals who discuss such topics as AIDS awareness, permanent partnership and how to maintain a strong self-esteem in a world bent on demoralizing diversity.

There are hundreds of homosexuals living in Manhattan. We seriously question the five to 10 homosexuals who have disclosed their homosexuality to you as representatives of all homosexuals in Manhattan or the country.

Many of us are not promiscuous, and we even aspire to monogamous relationships.

Manhattan is home to quite a few gay and lesbian couples who have been together for more than 10 years.

The next time you feel the need to moralize heterosexual behavior and demoralize homosexual behavior, we invite you to witness heterosexual relationships at work in Aggieville on a Saturday night.

Homosexuals openly discuss our sexual orientation, our identity, because people like you continue to stereotype our existence. You stated that your "sexuality is not the first thing I think of when I am asked about who I am." However, you also stated that if "heterosexuals were asked about who they are, they would answer with information about their job, their achievements and possibily their 'family.'"

It is the heterosexuals who force their orientation on society through heternormativity, the extent to which heterosexuals are unaware of the subtle and not-so-subtle ways they are constantly affirming their sexual identities by talking about their girl/boyfriends, husbands, wives or children.

If people like yourself would not try to demean us by suggesting that all gay men seek effeminate males and gays and lesbians are sex fiends, people like us would not have to waste our valuable time writing column and letters to the editor.

Manhattan USD 383 teaches sex education to eighth-graders. Religious extremists want the current curriculum to change to teach students that homosexuality is against the law in Kansas and that sex between men and women should be in the context of "heterosexual marriage" (HB2301).

The purpose of sex education is not only to give children an understanding of their sexual development but to instill a positive image of themselves in our society. In light of the fact that we are homosexual — and quite a few of us have children — we would prefer that USD 383 stick to its current curriculum, which does not endorse homosexuality, bisexuality or heterosexuality but attempts to explain sexuality in general to eighth graders.

Mastio, if you really believe that gays and lesbians are deviants whose only goal in life is to force homosexuality down your throat, we invite you to come to our next University meeting and see us for who we really are. Prepare to be disappointed, though; most of us live uneventful lives of studying and working to pay our bills.

And we are as tired of having to explain ourselves as you are of reading about us.

Nekkid mannequin arrested, rumored to be former editor

TWIN FALLS, IDAHO — A male mannequin in a Twin Falls, Idaho, store window looked all too real — especially from the waist down.

Police say they arrested a man after he removed his pants and posed in a carpet store window for several minutes.

Authorities say the man was wearing only a long-sleeved flannel shirt. He was cited for obscene public conduct.

Officer Steve Benkula was shocked after making the citation.

"No matter how much you've prepared yourself beforehand, you're never really ready to see a nekkid man," he said.

Smatterings has received numerous reports that the would-be model was none other than former Smatterings editor Andrew Spencer Tomb IV.

Tomb denied the allegations, saying he only takes off his pants at beer parties and Bar Mitzvahs.

Order a topless maid or butler to do that filthy housework

SOUTH WAYNE, WIS. — What is it with all these nekkid people in the news these days? As if mannequin-posing weren't enough, now (provided you have the cash), you can order one to be delivered to your home.

For $100 an hour, the folks at the Sneak-A-Peek Cleaning Service will send a topless maid or butler to do your dusting.

Vicki Henderson, proprietor from South Wayne, Wis., employs five men and eight women as R-rated housekeepers. She said her employees don't scrub toilets, don't do windows and won't do anything between the sheets.

And they're really cleaning house. After just two days of advertising, the topless cleaners are booked through April 1.

Henderson said she got the idea for topless maids from watching TV talk shows.

Hmmmm. Just think of what effect Rush Limbaugh could have.

Earth problems too weighty? Join the 13 living it up in space

SPACE CENTER, HOUSTON — A human space population of 13 might seem extraordinary now, but Endeavour commander Stephen Oswald predicts such a virtual colony will be mundane in 10 years.

The number of people in orbit jumped to 13 in three spaceships when Norman Thagard and two cosmonauts were launched aboard a Russian rocket toward the Mir space station this week.

"I think there's certainly some symbolism there in the way that the space programs of the world are headed," Oswald said in a space-to-ground news conference Tuesday.

"It is exciting to have 13 humans in orbit at once, but I don't think 10 years from now we'll look back at this and find that terribly out of the norm."

The astronauts are into the home stretch of a 15-1/2-day stargazing voyage. On Tuesday, they pointed three shuttle telescopes toward a giant black hole discovered last year by the Hubble Space Telescope.

Astronomers want to map star clusters, take ultraviolet photographs of the galaxy and study ultraviolet light from the M87 galaxy.

Meanwhile, back on earth, Smatterings has confirmed that people are still starving, crime is out of control, and public television is being slashed by 15 percent next year.

How's that black hole look, Sam?

Change your name, party with governor

LINCOLN, NEB. — Nebraska Gov. Ben Nelson says he's already met several Nebraskans who share his name, and now he wants to meet the rest. Nelson is calling on every Ben Nelson in the state to send him a postcard by May 1 with his address and phone number.

Nelson says he wants to celebrate a "Ben Nelson Day" and treat his like-named Nebraskans to a special event. The governor says sharing a name with someone in politics can be a burden, and he wants to say thanks to all the other Ben Nelsons.

In an exclusive Smatterings interview, an executive assistant to Nelson said the governor had no life, but he is a Ben Nelson.

Smatterings was not sponsored by the Greek Times.

"I'LL TAPE IT IF I CAN FIND SOMEONE WITH A VCR OR IF I KNOW IT'S GOING TO BE A GOOD EPISODE."

— Dylan Spencer
sophomore in marine and wildlife biology

TYE DERRINGTON/Collegian

Dylan Spencer, sophomore in marine and wildlife biology, and Jason Haremza, junior in chemistry, relax while watching an episode of "General Hospital" and discussing what happened earlier on "Days of Our Lives."

Like sands through the hourglass, these are the

DAYS OF THEIR LIVES

If you think only women watch daytime drama, then your perception is incorrect.

When it comes to "Days of Our Lives," many men at K-State openly admit to regularly watching the show.

Doug Hollingsworth, freshman in pre-veterinary medicine, said he started watching his soap when he moved into the Phi Gamma Delta fraternity last fall.

"The guys definitely get into it," Hollingsworth said. "Sometimes worse than girls."

Hollingsworth said he watches "Days of Our Lives" at least three to four times a week.

"If I miss the 12 o'clock one, I just watch it at one," he said.

Hollingsworth said he hasn't gotten to the point where he plans his class schedule around the show, but he said he does look forward to watching it.

"It's a fun thing," he said. "It's a good study break to sit down and watch."

Hollingsworth said at times it is frustrating when "Days of Our Lives" is canceled because of the O.J. Simpson trial.

"I'm so sick of it now," he said. "If the show's interrupted, it's not a big deal. I'm usually disappointed at first, but it's not a major part of my life."

Dylan Spencer, sophomore in marine and wildlife biology, said he's watched the show since the seventh grade.

"It's more popular than people think," Spencer said. "Most guys just don't want to admit it."

Spencer said he'll continue to watch the show even when he gets out of college.

"I'll tape it if I can find someone with a VCR or if I know it's going to be a good episode," he said.

Spencer said he heard on the news that "Days of Our Lives" is the No. 1 TV show for college-age adults.

"There's more widespread watchage than people realize," he said.

Spencer said it was a joyous occasion when Billie and Bo, two "Days" characters, finally got married.

"It was pretty neat," he said. "I was really happy for them. They were meant to be together."

Heath Freeman, sophomore in graphic design, said there are usually five to 10 men watching "Days of Our Lives" at the Delta Sigma Phi house.

"Sometimes we make fun of it," Freeman said. "But some people really get into it."

Freeman said he's not afraid to admit he likes the show and even discusses it with others.

"I tell my sister stuff about it," he said. "I don't try to hide it. I'm not ashamed."

Travis Olson, freshman in accounting, said his interest in "Days of Our Lives" comes in handy sometimes at parties.

"When you meet people at parties and the subject arises, it's a good way to keep up a conversation," Olson said.

Not all men are addicted to daytime drama.

Matt McCleur, junior in kinesiology, said he's not a big fan of soap operas.

"I don't watch them because they're boring and stupid," McCluer said.

But McCleur said he sometimes watches them in the K-State Union for a different reason.

"The only time I do watch them is when there are a whole bunch of girls in the TV room in the Union between classes," McCleur said.

Ryan Holt, junior in marketing, said when soap operas come on he usually tries to turn the channel or leave.

"It's just the same stuff over and over," Holt said.

With spring break kicking off today, this might be a perfect opportunity for students, men and women alike, to catch up on what's going on on their favorite soaps.

K-State whips Creighton, returns home to play Iowa

Creighton 5

K-State will open its Big Eight home season at 7 p.m. March 24 against Nebraska.

NICOLE POELL
Collegian

The K-State baseball team won't be enjoying sandy beaches or a week-long vacation when spring break officially begins this afternoon.

Instead, the Wildcats will have to soak up the rays at Frank Myers Field as they play host to the Iowa Hawkeyes during this weekend's homestand.

The action kicks off at 3 p.m. today, with another 3 p.m. game Saturday and a 1 p.m. contest set for Sunday.

The Cats enter weekend play on a winning note after Wednesday night's convincing 13-5 victory against the Creighton Bluejays.

The game in Omaha was the second meeting between the two schools, with the Cats getting revenge for an earlier 8-6 loss to the Bluejays at the Lake Area Classic.

It was a good night on the mound for K-State newcomer Matt Koeman, who picked up his first Division-I win.

Koeman lasted eight innings, giving up nine hits, striking out eight and walking seven.

With the win, he improved his record to 1-1 on the year.

K-State also put together a solid offensive effort as six Cats recorded multiple-hit games.

Leading the way was Dave Hendrix, who had three hits on the night, including two doubles.

Todd Fereday knocked in five RBIs, which included two runners scoring when he homered for the second time this year.

Tim Decker and Scott Poepard also pitched in with two doubles apiece. With the win, K-State evens its record to 6-6 on the season.

Iowa brings a 4-2 mark to Manhattan as the team tries to regroup after dropping two of three games against the Kansas Jayhawks last weekend.

This will be the first meeting between the two teams since 1982, when the Cats won two of three in Manhattan.

But K-State will be facing an experienced Hawkeye squad as Iowa returns 20 lettermen from last year's team, including seven starters in the field. Ten pitchers are also back, with seven returning starters.

K-State's Eric Yanz will probably be the first pitcher to face the Hawkeyes on today, with Coach Mike Clark expected to start Jon Oiseth on Saturday and Jack Witt on Sunday.

The Cats won't get any rest when Iowa leaves town.

The Cats will try to find some games in the early part of next week to make up for the seven they've lost as a result of inclement weather.

If that doesn't happen, K-State will have to wait until March 24 for its Big Eight home opener against Nebraska.

That game is scheduled for 7 p.m., with Saturday's game set for 3 p.m. and Sunday's contest beginning at 1 p.m.

The Cats are 0-2 so far in conference play after a couple of road losses to Oklahoma State.

K-State gets a big victory

Deep in the heart of Texas

Men's team places 1st out of 16 teams

BERNIE HANEY
Collegian

Even with the weather being an inconvenience to practice, the men's golf team went down to Austin, Texas, last weekend and placed first out of 16 teams in the Southwest Classic.

"I think it's great," K-State golf coach Mark Elliott said.

"I think the five that went understand they can be really good."

The team was in fifth place after the first round of competition.

This was K-State's first tournament action since November.

Leading the way for the Wildcats was Scott Hovis, junior in parks and recreation, who fired a 72 at Circle C Golf Club.

With K-State trailing by six strokes, the second round seemed to be more difficult because of the weather.

"The first day was perfect. On the second day, the wind was blowing 30 to 40 miles per hour," Elliott said.

"It's also a hard golf course, so that doesn't make it easy."

Hovis said the Texas-Arlington No. 1 man had to par the last hole for UTA to win the Southwest Classic.

He ended up struggling for a double bogey, which gave K-State a one-stroke victory against Texas.

"I thought we had a chance," Hovis said.

"I sat there and watched, but I was kind of in disbelief."

Hovis finished tied for fourth place out of 92 golfers with rounds of 72 and 78 for a 150 total.

The Wildcats also had three other players who finished in the top 20.

Chad Myers, Jason Losch and Chad Buckridge ended up tied in 19th place with 153 strokes.

"It's more fun to win as a team than to win as an individual," Chad Buckridge, sophomore in business administration, said.

The top player for K-State going into the tournament was Troy Halterman, who had two first-place finishes in the fall season.

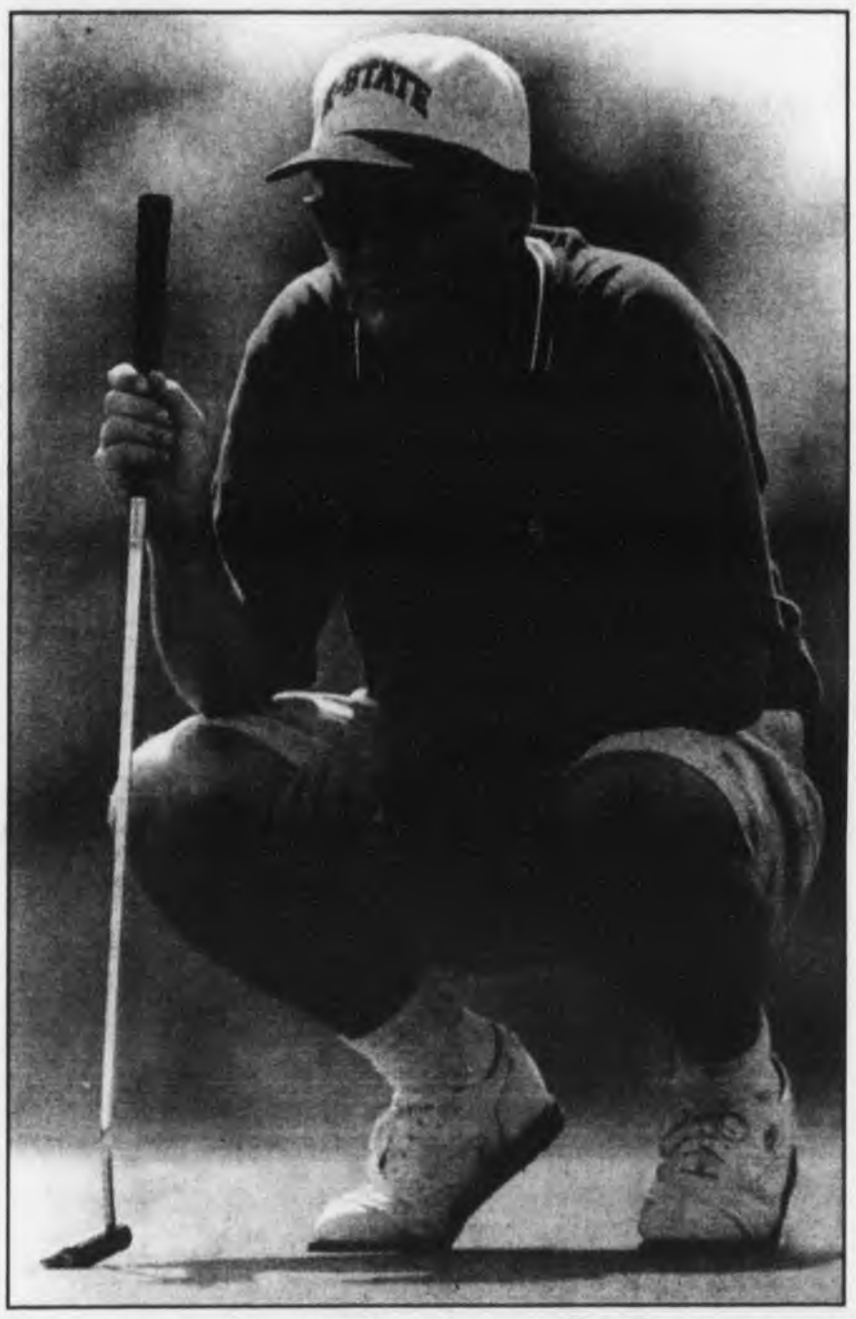
He ended up finishing tied for 52nd place, but Elliott said he thought Halterman was a little nervous.

"Troy was affected more than anybody by the little amount of practice time outdoors," Elliott said.

"He was a little nervous. He just didn't settle down and play."

K-State will travel to Springfield, Mo., on Mar. 27-28.

There will be 18 teams playing at Highland Springs Country Club in the Southwest Missouri State Invitational.



"It's going to be a good one. It is a tournament we have to do well in to make regionals," Hovis said.

"We're going to need to play well to do good."

Elliott said he just wants his team to go out and play their best.

"It's a good group, and I'm proud of them for what they did," Elliott said.

"It's a good start, but obviously all of them want more than that."

Women ready to tee off spring season in Texas this weekend

BERNIE HANEY
Collegian

The women's golf team will be busy during spring break.

K-State will be playing in three tournaments in a span of eight days.

The first trip for the team is Monday through Wednesday, when the squad will participate in the Lady Bronc Golf Classic in Harlingen, Texas.

"There are teams that have already played once or twice this year. Obviously, it doesn't help us, but it depends on how we approach it," first-year assistant golf coach Tim Jennings said.

Jennings said he has given the team more time on their own to prepare for the tournaments.

"I've given them drills to run through, but I have let them prepare as individuals. They have played enough competitively to prepare themselves," Jennings said.

"We're kind of approaching it from a different standpoint."

The A&M Bookstore/Welsh Memorial is the second tournament the women will compete in. The tournament will be played in College Station, Texas, March 24-25.

"I think everyone will enjoy it. There's no school, and it's during spring break," Dallas Cox, senior in elementary education, said. "It will be tough, but we will have no problems with it."

The final stop for the women's squad is a little closer to home in Springfield, Mo.

The Cats will run into the K-State men's team March 27-28. Both teams will be playing in the Southwest Missouri State Invitational.

"Typically, we always play well at the Southwest tournament," Jacque Wright, senior in horticulture, said.

Jennings said he expects good things from Wright, who missed the last three tournaments in the fall season.

"She knows what she has to do," Jennings said. "Hopefully she will relax, enjoy herself and just let it happen. She is obviously our team leader."

Jennings said conditioning will be a factor for these three tournaments.

"They are going to need to be in the best shape they can. It's not just playing ability there, but a test of endurance," Jennings said.

"That first round is going to be real indicative of how we're going to do on our trip."

Jennings, a 1990 K-State graduate, said he is enjoying his coaching duties so far but has experienced his fair share of mistakes.

"Every day is just a learning experience. It's all new. You make some mistakes as a first-year coach. You do things that you think is right and learn from all those experiences," Jennings said.

Wright said the team sounds optimistic about its upcoming road trip.

"The downside is that we've not been able to play very much. We're not going in looking at it negatively or as a real confidence-booster, either," Wright said.

Women's golf team will compete in three tournaments during spring break.

Netters travel to New Orleans for triple header

BRIAN THOMAS
Collegian

Spring break is a time when students hit the beaches of Florida and the slopes of Colorado or just head home to visit with family.

For K-State's tennis team, though, it's business as usual.

The 5-4 Wildcats travel to the Big Easy for a scheduled triple-header this weekend in New Orleans.

K-State snapped a three-game losing streak with a pair of victories over Drake, 5-4, and Northern Illinois, 9-0, two weeks ago in Des Moines, Iowa.

Wildcat tennis coach Steve Bietau said his team gained some confidence with the victories, especially the Drake match.

"I think that the Drake match may help them with their confidence," Bietau said.

"The match with Northern Illinois wasn't really much of a challenge. We took care of business and did exactly what had to be done."

After the Iowa trip, the new Rolex Collegiate Rankings were released.

K-State all-America Karina Kuregian, 5-2 during the spring season, dropped from ninth to No. 26 in the national singles rankings. With a perfect 6-0 spring record, the doubles team of Kuregian and Martine Shrubsole entered the rankings at the No. 14 position.

The Cats open play in New Orleans Saturday against host Tulane, followed by matches Sunday against Rice and Monday against Cornell.

"Rice is probably the best team we will face in New Orleans," Bietau said.

"Particularly their doubles team will be a good test for Karina and Martine. They need to post a good quality win, and Rice's No. 1 doubles team will give them an opportunity to do that," he said.

The duo of Paula Myslivecek and Antonette Veloso will challenge Kuregian and Shrubsole.

The Rice pair maintain the No. 31 ranking in the nation after holding the No. 13 spot during the fall season.

Bietau said the trip to New Orleans will be all work and not much play.

"We're definitely down there for business," Bietau said.

"We have to maintain our concentration while we're down there. We'll have a few days off after the break for a breather before we start the Big Eight. Our team has worked hard the last few games. We have to keep it up."

Following spring break, the Cats will open conference play March 29 at Missouri. The next home action will be April 2 against Oklahoma State.

▶ NCAA TOURNAMENT

Manhattan upsets 4th seed Oklahoma, proves it deserves spot in tournament

ASSOCIATED PRESS

MEMPHIS, Tenn. — The doubters were wrong. Manhattan really does belong in the NCAA tournament.

The Jaspers got big contributions from their bench, including 14 second-half points from Jeronimo Bucero, and upset fourth-seeded Oklahoma 77-67 on Thursday in the opening round of the NCAA tournament's Southeast Regional.

"Bob Frederick and the tournament selection committee are not quite as dumb as people think," Manhattan coach Fran Fraschilla said, referring to the chairman of the committee who attended the game.

When the Jaspers (26-4) were chosen as an at-large team from the Metro Atlantic Athletic Conference, the decision raised more than a few eyebrows.

Manhattan, seeded 13th, was the first MAAC team to receive an at-large berth and now have made a little more history. The victory was the Jaspers' second in NCAA tournament play, and the 26 wins are the most in their 89-year history.

"It goes to show that these mid-conference teams can knock off anybody on any given day," guard Ted Ellis said.

Oklahoma's largest lead was 28-20 late in the first half. Manhattan got within five at halftime and then scored the first six points of the second half. Oklahoma's last lead was 43-42 on a three-pointer by Calvin Curry with 13:36 to go.

"It's easy to sit here and nitpick the game," Oklahoma coach Kelvin Sampson said. "Manhattan just outplayed us."

DIVERSIONS

COMEDY OUT OF TOWN

Comedian Margaret Cho, star of the sitcom "All American Girl" will be performing at the Union at the University of Kansas, March 31. Tickets are $7.

The Smothers Brothers will be at the Topeka Arts Center at 8 p.m., March 25. Tickets cost $19, $25, and $30.

Why can't they all just get along?

Dear Cassie,

I am writing in response to Wednesday's letter about the Panama City boys.

First of all, the girl did not ask him to go skiing. He asked her after he had already decided to go on his own.

Second, the trip was not planned out. They had just decided to go to Panama City a few weeks ago.

Third, I think this guy is big enough that he can make his own decisions and not worry about his roommates griping on him like they were his mother.

Signed, Goin' Skiing

Dear Goin' Skiing,

You are setting yourself up for a fall if you get in the middle of this dispute between a man and his roommates. The roommates need to stop blaming you, and you would be wise not to gripe at them.

▶ MOVIE REVIEW

'King George' a hit, appeals to any appetite

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Collegian

Movies based on historical figures can either work beautifully or fail miserably.

"The Madness of King George" is one of the very few that succeeds— and succeed with a passion.

If you have seen older movies about kings and queens, what you'll find is some very stuffy, unnatural dialogue and implausibilities at every corner.

Filmmakers have glorified past royalty with over-intelligent conversation and sweeping, tragic plot lines.

★★★★ "The Madness of King George"

Ratings:
★★★★ Must see
★★★ Worth a peek
★★ Good future rental
★ Bastardization of cinema

"Madness," based on the stage play by Alan Bennett, is a refreshing look at England's monarchy, cutting through the bullshit to present an everybody's king. Of course, King George (Nigel Hawthorne) wasn't peasant-like; he wasn't a Bill Clinton.

He did retain the majesty and tradition of the monarchy. But, the movie excels in glimpsing George's private life and tender moments with his wife (Helen Mirren).

King George III, who ruled during England's loss of the American colonies (1760-1820), briefly went mad during his reign. He wasn't totally gone, but he lost his marbles every once in a while in a sort of on-and-off lunacy.

The king's doctors are confounded. The most they can do is blister him — being the medical geniuses they were, of course. Eventually, his condition worsens to the point when a doctor, specializing in mentally ill people, is brought in to heal the king.

Hawthorne brings the sort of perfection to the role that only someone who played it on the stage, which he did, can attain. Hawthorne's King George is one of the truly great performances of an actor's lifetime that go unnoticed. He is nominated for a Best Actor Oscar but won't win.

Mirren, of "Prime Suspect" fame, brings just the right amount of emotional intensity to George's queen, never denying her love of her husband and her children. Mirren is nominated for a Best Actress Oscar.

The oddest aspects of "Madness" aren't George's crazy quirks, but the Prince of Wales' (Rupert Everett) exploits in Parliament.

Because he is the first in line to the throne, the Prince plots to declare his father unfit to rule and take control of England for himself. It wouldn't be as strange if the Prince wasn't dolled up in horrid wigs, foolish hats and droll dress.

"Madness" will appeal to practically any appetite, offering comic relief in the form of numerous royal stool samples, highly-intense drama, and fascinating historical insight.

Perhaps the funniest insight "Madness" explores is the very idea of the monarchy.

Alternative acoustic duo in town over spring break

STEPHANIE SWISHER
Collegian

Another alternative music event is on the horizon for Manhattan.

Pete and Maura Kennedy, an acoustic duo, will perform at 8 p.m. Wednesday at Rowdy Trouty's in Aggieville.

The duo's music ranges from pop to folk to neo-psychedelic to country with an underlying Byrds-like influence.

The Kennedys might be new to Manhattan, but they are not new to the music scene.

Pete Kennedy played lead guitar for Mary Chapin Carpenter on her 1991 tour. In 1993, Pete and Maura toured with Nanci Griffith's Blue Moon Orchestra on its European tour before forming their own duo.

Griffith is known as one of the most successful American performers on the European folk and country scene, said David Kamerer, professor of journalism and mass communications and sponsor of the event.

Maura said the European tour brought the two together.

When the Kennedys toured with Griffith, they played large places like Royal Albert Hall, but Pete said they prefer to play smaller venues in general.

"We like to play for smaller crowds," Pete said. "Nanci plays big halls, but we like to play places like coffee houses. You can see the people and feel their feedback immediately."

Striking melodies and deep, thoughtful lyrics support the Kennedys' music.

"A lot of songs have storylines that allow people to follow," Pete said. "We're big fans of e.e. cummings, and we incorporate a lot of poetry. Different people get different meanings," he said.

Pete said their songs were based on stories instead of literal storylines.

The Kennedys are being sponsored by Birdhouse Production, a non-profit organization working to bring alternative music styles to the Manhattan area. The performance is open to the public and free of charge.

Birdhouse's most recent event was Radim Zenkl, a world-class mandolin player.

Kansas history taught by dance

MICHELLE BELCHER
Collegian

Modern dance and Kansas history will come together this weekend when the Prairie Wind Dancers perform at the Columbian Theatre in Wamego.

The Prairie Wind Dance troupe, started in 1986 by director Candi Baker, was founded on the belief that dance can communicate strong images of nature to audiences of all ages.

"I heard wonderful things about the group from their performances in the Topeka public schools," said Linda Uthoff, artistic director at the Columbian Theatre and Arts Center.

The group tries to show its audiences historical facts through dance.

The first half of the show is a variety of themes.

"The group worked with people in a crisis shelter in Lawrence. They came out with themes of addiction for their performances," Uthoff said. "A very powerful piece grew out of that theme."

The second half of the performance tells the history of Kansas pioneers.

"They present a piece called 'Kansas Folklore in Motion.' It tells a story of the time when people relied on each other in Kansas and how they kept on together in hard times," Uthoff said.

The troupe takes the audience back in time to celebrate Kansas history and the first pioneers who settled here.

"Their choreography works well with different age groups, especially in their workshops,"

Camp changed student's view

Involved engineer alters perception, succeeds in major

LINDA HARVEY
Collegian

Nancy Fleming was exposed to engineering early on.

"My interest in engineering came from my father, who's a quality-control engineer," Fleming, senior in industrial engineering, said.

She also had the chance to learn about engineering in high school through a National Science Foundation engineering camp at Wichita State University. Fleming spent her time at the camp learning about science and research.

Fleming

"I think before that I had the perception that engineers were male and on the slightly nerdy side," Fleming said.

"That camp changed my perception."

Throughout her time at K-State, Fleming has been an active part of the engineering program.

During her freshman year, she was recruited by the Society of Women Engineers and has been an active member ever since. Fleming was president the first year she was a senior.

"She's one of those people you instantly like," said Ruth Dyer, SWE faculty adviser and associate professor in electrical and computer engineering.

Fleming said people might believe SWE and related organizations are available as a crutch for women engineers.

"They're not," she said. "The reason I got in was strictly to meet other women engineers."

Fleming said she hasn't always had such an interest in engineering.

"Thinking back to fourth grade, I hated math," she said.

In college, Fleming has had to change her perception of herself as an engineer.

"I can remember sitting in classes thinking I've got to be the dumbest person here," she said.

"Then I started getting good grades in those classes. I had to change my perception."

Fleming has also participated in the Engineering Ambassadors program, the Institute of Industrial Engineering and the Honors Research program. After living in Smurthwaite House for two years, she now serves as the living group's kitchen manager 20 hours a week.

She was chosen as an executive member of the Ambassadors her junior year and said she believes the program is much different than the other ambassador programs at K-State.

"I had the chance to plan out some goals and objectives for the ambassadors," Fleming said. "We were able to increase visits to high schools 250 percent.

In her job at Smurthwaite, Fleming has had the opportunity to incorporate total-quality management into the kitchen situation. She is in charge of the facility and scheduling workers, helps train dietitians and works as a trouble shooter.

"I make sure everyone does their job," she said.

As part of the Institute of Industrial Engineers, Fleming was able to present a paper on the inclusion of total quality management at Smurthwaite during a paper conference hosted by the Institute.

Dyer said she's been trying to get Fleming to go to graduate school here.

"Nancy has the effect on people where she puts them at ease," Dyer said. "She will definitely be missed."

When she's not presenting papers or working at Smurthwaite, Fleming said she's looking for a job or trying to squeeze in a little free time.

"It doesn't seem like I have any free time. I like to be involved in community service. I'm still involved in Smurthwaite projects, and with SWE's Girl Scout Engineering Day," she said.

Fleming said she believes that it's one of the most important things SWE does.

"I can see how a direct application of a Girl Scout day like this can influence girls for the better," she said.

▶ CAMPUS

Women engineers introduce field to elementary students

LINDA HARVEY
Collegian

Area sixth-grade students are getting the chance to learn about engineering, thanks to the Society of Women Engineers.

"We're trying to give them a real general idea of what engineering is and what engineers do," said Lynnette Lockwood, junior in mechanical engineering and chairwoman for the visits.

Visits to the eight elementary schools in Manhattan started March 3 and will continue for the next four weeks. This is the organization's second year doing the presentations.

"SWE encourages all of its chapters to talk to youth," Lockwood said.

Kristina Rizek, junior in chemical engineering, and Angela Raymer, sophomore in industrial engineering, led the first presentation at Bluemont Elementary.

"I thought it went well," Rizek said. "When I went, I had no idea how it was going to go. I had no prep time with Angela."

During their presentations, members of SWE present the students with a variety of engineering-related topics.

Rizek and Raymer showed a video about bike-making, talked about the physics of a boomerang made by an SWE member and let the students test the weight capacity of a paper tower made by a K-State student in an engineering class.

They also talked about how everyday things have all had some kind of contact with engineering.

"I wish we could have brought more," Rizek said. "I would have brought more examples of how physics relates to real life."

As Rizek and Raymer explained that the tower was made with just 100 sheets of copy paper and a small bottle of glue, many of the sixth-grader's mouths dropped.

"That's it?" one student in Kathy Lippert's class asked.

Lippert, whose background is in science, has started teaching her students about formulas and the periodic table.

"A lot of the things I'm teaching these kids about are the same things the SWE women are talking about," Lippert said. "It's really nice to see this represented here."

Rizek said formulas and chemistry are her life.

"I live with this chart," Rizek said, holding up her bent copy of a periodic chart.

Rizek also said that she would really like to do these presentations in her hometown of Belleville.

"I want those kids to know that girls do go to college," she said. "Girls down there aren't openly encouraged to go to college or into engineering."

She also said that she was surprised that many of the girls in the Bluemont class did not come up and talk to her or Raymer.

"I think they may have been a little intimidated by the boys, " Rizek said. "It kind of disappointed me. Then again, it may have just been that one class."

from the 1970s and have a heavy Eagles sound in some of the songs.

One of the more apparent influences is Lynrd Skynrd, whose "Sweet Home Alabama" Western Flyer performed late in the set.

"We sing what we like to hear, but we don't copy any one style," Myrick said. "We have six guys from six different backgrounds — that collective sound makes us unique."

Encouraging the crowd to sing and yell during the song, the group brought down the house with traditional southern rock.

The entire time Western Flyer was on stage, they had fun performing to the crowd and trying to get them to participate.

A medley to the classic western song "16 Tons" showcased the group's vocal and instrumental abilities and allowed them to have some fun.

All six members took a turn at a new version of the song, ranging from rap to bluegrass to heavy metal as the crowd laughed, cheered and yelled for more.

"We absolutely have fun — that's why we put together that song," Myrick said.

"When you grow up in the MTV era, you have got to have a show. We want them to leave saying 'We saw a show!' We try not to take ourselves too seriously."

After their performance, the group came back out to sign autographs and meet their fans.

A long line of fans formed, waiting for their turn to meet and talk to the group.

"We love doing college towns and clubs," Myrick said. "You have the smoke and crowd noise to deal with, but you are closer to the crowd, and you get to meet them."

Western Flyer and Perfect Stranger put together an excellent show. If you missed the performance, go buy their compact discs and listen to them.

Feminist movement now addressing race and class, battling label's image

Taylor also said there were other reasons people don't like the term feminist.

"Feminism can sometimes carry with it the connotation that if you say you're a feminist, then it can mean you're a lesbian, and for men it can mean you're gay, and I think people are afraid of that. Again, that's just another situation of a narrow mind," he said.

Shane Jones, sophomore in horticulture, said he thinks feminism sometimes consists of women trying to use gender to their advantage in the job market.

"Sometimes they take it too far. Like because they're women, they should get special treatment," Jones said.

Jones said he thought affirmative action might hurt his chances of finding employment when he entered the job market.

"There's a lot of stuff now with women being hired as minorities," he said.

Jones said he thought sports was one area where women were starting to achieve equality in pay.

"There's a lot of sports where women get paid quite a bit, like tennis and golf," he said.

However, Jones said he didn't consider women to be equal to men when it came to a lot of physical activity.

"If I went to the rec center and a girl wanted to play on my team, I probably wouldn't let her," he said.

Jones said he often makes sexist jokes just to irritate women he knows, but he doesn't think he treats them as inferiors on an everyday basis.

"Some people would accuse me of being a chauvinist," he said.

Jake Breeding, sophomore in pre-medicine, said he thinks feminism has changed drastically since the '60s and '70s.

"To me, I would define feminism as the extreme view, the reverse of the macho image on the women's side," he said.

Breeding said he thinks women are making the job market more competitive.

"Men are starting to realize that it's not just a man's world anymore," he said.

"The old 'I'm a man, you're a woman' argument just isn't going to work anymore."

Breeding said because he came from a rural background, coming to K-State changed his view of feminism. He said the difference in attitudes really struck him the first time he opened up the Opinion page of the Collegian and read something a female columnist had written.

"My eyes have been opened," he said.

Breeding said he thinks feminism has a goal that can be reached.

"When sexual harassment is a mute issue and promotions are equal, I think feminism will be dead. I think we're rapidly moving to that point," he said.

Marlene Howell, instructor in women's studies, said feminism is an ongoing process.

"I think of feminism more as a process than a goal. Within that process, there are goals," she said. "We might have goals, but then there'll be more goals."

Howell said feminism has gotten a bad name because it challenged male dominance.

"I think it's been misunderstood," she said.

"Also, if we take a look at movements for social change, they will often get a bad name when they are doing what they are supposed to do, which is challenge the system."

Howell said she thinks feminism has changed because it is now addressing race and class as a part of the movement.

"We always have to figure in race and class when talking bout feminism," Howell said.

"When my mother had me, it wasn't an option to go to work. On the other hand, women of color have always been in the workplace — often cleaning the homes of white women."

Jana Leep, graduate student in English, said she thinks there will always be a need for feminism in society.

"I think any utopia we try to create will eventually repress us," she said.

"There's always a need for political change."

Leep said thinks the definition of feminism has changed.

"I see it as positive change," she said.

"The definition is expanding, which is good because it allows more people to define themselves as feminists."

However, Leep said she thinks feminism is a private, personal process for her.

"I don't feel like I have to answer to some protocol," she said.

Leep said she has recently enjoyed talking to women who call themselves feminists and still feel like they can wear makeup and be feminine.

"I'd like women not to be so ashamed of themselves in any kind of role they want to be in," she said.

"There's always this sense you're not doing enough."

Howell also said being able to make choices as women is important.

"Staying at home if it's a choice is much different than if it isn't," she said.

Leep said she thinks young women don't realize what the women's movement used to be like.

"I think a lot of young women take for granted the work that early feminists have done," she said.

"We're living in a reality they helped construct, and we're benefiting from it."

Howell said she agreed.

"If that's true, then that would be because feminism has failed to pass on the torch to a younger generation," she said.

"There's still a lot of work to be done."

Trembley said she thinks college is a time when young women can take charge of their lives.

"I think that especially for women in college, we're able to exert ourselves, and in college we take a lot of leadership positions," she said.

Trembley said she doesn't consider herself a feminist because she doesn't believe in all of the things she associates with that label.

"I still believe that in certain places we are not equal to men," she said.

Trembley said her background has taught her certain views that she plans to stick to.

"Men have their certain roles in society, and women have their certain roles in society, even if those roles aren't as defined as they used to be," she said.

Country musician lives his dream, values relationships can stimulate ideas for songs.

"My favorite song, lets see — that's hard to say. It's like asking me which one of my children I like best," Brooks said. He finally named "Brand New Man" his favorite.

"It was our first No. 1 single. It put us on the road and put us on the map," he said.

Brooks attributes Tim DuBois, who runs Arista/Nashville, for getting him and Dunn together.

"He inspired us and sold us on the idea that we were an act. Then he offered us a record deal," Brooks said.

DuBois observed the similarities in the pair's musical styles and proposed the two musicians team up.

Although it may be hard to believe that two people in such a close working relationship don't get on each other's nerves, Brooks said he and Dunn get along fine.

"It's really pretty hunky-dory," Brooks said.

He said they both appreciate how well things have been going for them and wouldn't want their egos to get in the way.

Another relationship Brooks said he really cares about is the one with his family. He said it's tough not being able to see his 6-year-old son, 8-year-old daughter and wife of 14 years as much as he'd like.

Brooks said he feels bad about missing the children's soccer games, but he said he is grateful they are understanding about him living his dream.

"They know it won't last forever," he said.

For now, Brooks said he and Dunn are enjoying their success.

"I don't think either one of us expected it would last this long," Brooks said.

Brooks said he didn't think success had changed him.

"I don't think I'll ever change," Brooks said.

He said the duo would never be so arrogant as to think that it doesn't take a lot of people to be successful. That's exactly why he said he doesn't complain about signing autographs or being recognized in public.

"Actually, Ronnie usually gets recognized more than me. It's his hair that really gives him away.

"It's really hard to miss a South American bird walking around," he said.

"Of course if Ronnie was here, he'd say, 'With feet as big as yours, I don't see how anyone could miss you.'"

Student Body President Jeff Peterson and Vice President Brad Finkeldei announce their candidacy for a second term March 19 at Peterson's home in Burdick.

Peterson, Finkeldei announce re-election bid

SARAH LUNDAY
Collegian

Jeff Peterson, student body president, announced March 19 from his family's farm near Burdick his decision to run for re-election.

Peterson said he wanted to announce from his home because of the closeness he feels with his family, the community and the open country.

"I relate better when I'm out in the open," he said.

STUDENT ELECTIONS '95

Students like Peterson and Brad Finkeldei, vice president and running mate, because of their out-in-the-open and straightforward attitude, Mike Zamrzla, chief of staff, said.

"It's a matter of being honest and true to your word," Zamrzla said.

The truth is that regardless of what happens during elections, he and Finkeldei are going to be serving the students in some capacity next year, Peterson said.

"The key is, I think students realize we've served students," Peterson said.

Peterson said the reason he is running again is to continue serving the students.

"I don't want the position; I want the job," he said.

In the last year, the student administration has worked on lowering the cost of higher education, increasing campus safety, campus parking and the Union expansion project among other activities, Peterson said.

However, he said he wants the campaign to focus on what they can do for students in the next year.

"I want to make it clear that there are a lot more things that we can accomplish," Peterson said.

Finkeldei said one thing to look at in the future is that many of the projects created during the year are long-term and will require attention during the next term, also.

For example, he said the expansion of the campus escort service, making the Union expansion project profitable and the campus parking situation need to be carried over as responsibilities for the next term.

Lowering student cost was last year's election campaign theme, and it will also be integrated into this year's campaign, Finkeldei said.

The focus was to change the trend of increasing costs in education, he said.

"We can help control student fees," he said.

Student fees decreased by $1 this year, Finkeldei said.

"It is the first time in 10 years they did go down," Finkeldei said.

This year and last year, Peterson said, what is most important is the students and being approachable.

"You need people in office to be approachable," Peterson said.

Finkeldei said a lot of students talk to him, and it makes him feel connected.

Zamrzla said Peterson and Finkeldei will be treading new ground if they are re-elected.

If elected, it will be the first time in the history of K-State that a student body president has served two terms, he said.

▶ PARKING

Garage in stadium will not be possibility

SARAH LUNDAY
Collegian

Memorial Stadium is no longer a possible location for a parking garage.

"In view of response, that area will be eliminated as a potential site," President Jon Wefald said.

Tom Rawson, vice president of administration and finance, said listening to what the students had to say helped extricate the site as a possible location.

"Hindsight is really pretty good," he said.

Also, a parking garage will not be part of K-State's five-year capital-improvements plan submitted to the Kansas Board of Regents at the end of March, Rawson said.

He said the elimination of a parking garage as part of the University's plan can be attributed to the delay of the Anderson Avenue expansion.

A planned addition of a left turn lane on Anderson Avenue between 17th Street and Denison Avenue was scheduled

Guidelines for funding made clearer

LISA ELLIOTT
Collegian

Student Senate by unanimous consent passed a clearer version of the funding guidelines for campus groups March 16.

Ben Clouse, Allocations Committee chairman, said he hoped Senate would pass the regulations because the committee tried to put Senate's informal regulations into the funding regulations.

"I am sick of them," Clouse said. "I think what we've put together is pretty darn good."

Only three amendments were made to the regulations on the floor.

Brent Wiedeman, agriculture senator, proposed an amendment to strike a clause prohibiting the use of student fee money to pay for Open House activities.

"It's a showcase of students and their abilities and what they've done," Trent LeDoux, agriculture senator, said.

Open House is more than a recruiting tool, Wiedeman said. Current K-State students have the opportunity to represent clubs, colleges and the University and show off projects.

Wiedeman said the Agriculture College Council funds 20 percent of the Open House activities while the dean picks up the rest.

"Support the college councils and let them fund Open House," he said.

Melisa Brazzle, education senator and Allocations Committee member, said she felt students really did not benefit from Open House because it is primarily a recruitment tool for the University and the colleges.

The dean of education has refused to fund activities for Open House in the past, Brazzle said.

"It is a showcase of student effort and student achievement," LeDoux said. "In my college, this is the big deal."

Wiedeman's amendment passed.

Bill Muir, faculty representative, sponsored an amendment with Stephen Seely, arts and sciences senator, and Clouse to strike a sentence that conflicted with another clause.

The final amendment was proposed by Brenda Halinski, graduate school senator. Her amendment provided for the purchase of flowers for student funerals from the student body president's discretionary fund.

Traditionally, the student body president purchased flowers for student funerals from the fund, Brad Finkeldei, student body vice president, said.

The funding regulations prohibited the use of any student fee money to purchase flowers in the old regulations.

Both amendments passed.

Another bill sponsored by the Allocations Committee corrected the allocations bill for 1996.

A line-item fee for the Office of Student Activities and Services was approved earlier in the semester.

The wording of the allocations bill had to be changed to clarify the money for OSAS was coming from a line-item fee instead of the general budget.

The amendment passed.

Fire damages apartment building

NOLAN SCHRAMM
MIKE BUNCH
Collegian

A fire gutted the top two floors of an apartment building at 412 N. 11th Street on March 17, leaving its residents homeless.

At 9:05 p.m., the Manhattan Fire Department responded to the report and arrived to find the second and third floors on fire.

"I was on the phone at the time when a guy from downstairs came up and said the place was on fire," Donald Olson, freshman in information systems, said. "I heard sirens at that time, but no one was inside yet. They had just arrived."

The fire was started by an electrical short in the building's exterior wiring. It then spread to a bathroom on the second floor. Charles Herr, landlord, said no one was hurt.

"One of the kids started into the bathroom and saw fire coming from the light fixture," he said. "He tried to put it out with a fire extinguisher, but it was too much, so he called the fire department."

Rhonda Lyne said she was coming back to the apartment building with Chris Giggy, a resident, to get his wallet before going to Aggieville.

She looked back toward the parking lot, which was on the east side of the house.

"His truck was behind there," she said. "And there was burning stuff coming out that window."

Giggy's room was one floor away from being engulfed by fire. Instead, it got doused with water.

He walked out of the house and dropped a Doc Marten boot to the sidewalk. It plopped to the ground, and water oozed out, forming a puddle on the sidewalk.

"I guess the fire started in the bathroom upstairs," he said. His bathroom was right below it.

"That was in the bathroom," he said as he dropped the other boot next to it. "You can see they're just trashed."

Steve Burnett, assistant director of the Manhattan Fire Department, said it was a high-damage fire, with damage to the second and third floors.

"As soon as it hit the attic, it spread sideways throughout the roof," he said.

The top of the big building was charred, with black stains on the white paint where flames had burned away the paint below the roof.

The fire department reported damage estimates at $200,000 to the structure and $40,000 damage to the contents.

Opportunity, responsibility key to nation's success

WASHINGTON — The country that does the best job of developing the full capacities of its citizens will be the most successful in the 21st century, President Clinton said during a White House press conference Thursday.

"The key to our future is our ability to create more opportunity and, at the same time, the willingness of our citizens to assume more responsibility," Clinton said. "That's what I have called the New Covenant."

Clinton said this could be done by economically expanding the middle class and shrinking the under class and by promoting mainstream values of work, the family and future. In addition, Clinton said this should be done with a government that is smaller and less bureaucratic but still effective.

Attendance at the press conference included 120 collegiate journalists from 80 different universities and colleges across America. The topics Clinton addressed varied from student financial-aid issues to affirmative action.

"This is a historical era — we have the end of the Cold War, the dawn of the Information Age, a globalized economy, an explosion of entrepreneurism and enormous amount of opportunity," he said.

Clinton said the country is facing profound challenges at the same time.

"We have almost 20 years of straight income in the United States. We have a growing inequality of incomes based primarily on educational differentials," he said. "We have deep strains within our society and still profound problems related to the breakdown of family and community, and the rise of crime and violence."

Clinton said there are challenges abroad in terrorism, environmental destruction, population explosion and the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction.

He said there is an ongoing debate about the national government's role in meeting these challenges. The old view, he said, is that government is inherently a positive force and that there is a one-size-fits-all, big-government solution to every problem. He said other people view the federal government as the cause of the nation's problems.

Clinton said his view is different than the others.

"I believe the role of government is to increase opportunity as we shrink bureaucracy, to empower people to make the most of their own lives, and to enhance our security at home and

▶ FIRE IN K-STATE UNION CAUSES AN ESTIMATED $47,500 IN DAMAGES

Fire ignited in an office adjacent to the K-State Union Bookstore sometime between midnight Friday and Sunday morning.

A fan, set to cool off computer equipment, started the fire, said Rick Berry, Manhattan Fire Department battalion chief.

"The last person to be in the office was Friday at midnight," Berry said. "The fire had burned itself out and had been out for a while when we got there."

The fire was reported at 11:15 a.m. Sunday by Rick Davis, student building manager, Berry said.

There was an estimated $40,000 damage to computer equipment and $7,500 structural damage, Berry said. There was also smoke damage in the Union director's office.

Jack Connaughton, associate director of the Union, said the fire affected the computer that handles the Wildcat Card accounts.

Technicians are working on the system, but Sunday night Connaughton said he was unsure how much the fire affected the system.

Students may have some inconvenience using the account today and Tuesday.

Students should present their cards to the cashier, but they may not be able to check their balances, he said.

▶ HOUSE VOTES TO SUPPORT USE OF MARIJUANA FOR MEDICAL REASONS

TOPEKA (AP) — Kansans who use marijuana for medical purposes have the House of Representatives on their side. It decided Friday to approve use of the drug for people who have cancer glaucoma or multiple sclerosis.

The bill allows the drug's use when it is prescribed by two doctors. It passed the House, 89-32, and went to the Senate.

The bill also would limit the use of the stimulant ephedrine, which is the only ingredient in the over-the-counter product Minithins. Minithins is marketed to help people with asthma.

Rep. Jim Garner, D-Coffeyville, called the drug pep tabs and said it is often abused, especially by children and teen-agers. Marijuana is sometimes prescribed by doctors to relieve symptoms and side effects of cancer treatment, glaucoma and multiple sclerosis.

Rep. Rochelle Chronister, R-Neodesho, said the bill only would provide a defense for someone who is convicted of using marijuana when it is prescribed.

"It doesn't open up the issue of marijuana except for people who really, truly can use that drug," she said.

Rep. John Edmonds, R-Great Bend, voted against the bill because he said it could open up the legal use of marijuana.

Garner's proposal would prohibit the sale of any product that is 100 percent ephedrine, unless anyone 18 or older buys it from a pharmacist. He said the product is currently sold at convenience stores where children can easily purchase it.

Fifteen states currently have laws limiting the sale of ephedrine, Garner said.

▶ WELFARE REFORM BILL PASSES QUICKLY

WASHINGTON (AP) — Despite bitter debate, Republicans pushed their sweeping welfare reform bill through the House quickly. The bill spent two months in committee and four days of fighting on the floor. No such speedy fate awaits welfare reform in the Senate.

Hearings are just getting under way on that side of the Capitol and lawmakers in both parties have expressed reservations about cutting off assistance to teen-age mothers and other needy families.

House Republicans say their bill, which passed the House on Friday 234-199 will get rid of federal bureaucracy and help free poor people from an endless cycle of poverty.

▶ WOMAN GAINS SIGHT FROM SON'S CORNEA

FORT SMITH, Ark. (AP) — Christopher Colin was a devoted son who vowed to always take care of his blind, reclusive mother.

He kept that promise even after his death at age 15, giving her the gift she needed to get by without him: her sight.

With the transplanted cornea she received from her son, Sally Colin opened her eyes Friday and saw clearly for the first time since 1982. She saw her 9-year-old daughter, whom she had never seen before. She also saw her 13-year-old son, who was just a baby when Colin lost her sight to a degenerative eye disease.

She was surprised at how much they had grown. She had imagined them with tiny bodies, clothes and shoes.

■ In the front-page story on Student Senate in the March 17 Collegian, it was reported that the planned expansion of Anderson Hall will take away spaces in the Union lot. It should have said the planned expansion of Anderson Avenue will take away spaces in the Union lot.

Belting out country tunes, Brooks and Dunn fired up the Bramlage Coliseum audience during their world-tour stop Saturday night in Manhattan.

CROWD PLEASERS

Duo entertains audience, uses special effects to enhance show

NIKOLA ZYTKOW
Collegian

The anticipation in the air was as thick as the fog that rose from the stage as the crowd awaited the appearance of one of country music's favorite duos Saturday night at Bramlage Coliseum.

But Brooks and Dunn couldn't just start the performance wandering onto the stage. They had to have the perfect atmosphere, complete with huge descending cattle skulls, a backdrop illustration of a sunset and two big screens showing a fireball traveling over mountain tops.

The audience went wild as Brooks and Dunn jumped onto the stage and went right into the lively "Little Miss Honky Tonk."

Even at the beginning of the show, one could see the differing styles of the two performers.

Dunn, with his black, beaded jumpsuit and tall, spiked hair, didn't look like the typical country singer. He gracefully walked the stage and while gesturing, sang out to the audience.

Brooks, on the other hand, came out in a bright red shirt and tight blue jeans decorated with a glimmering belt buckle. He was the epitome of country as he energetically danced around onstage, strutting his guitar, ready to stir up the crowd.

The fading, painted sunset in the back reflected their change of mood, as Brooks and Dunn calmed a little for "She's Not the Cheatin' Kind."

The duo writes most of its own songs and performs them with an equally feverish passion, as was evident when Brooks sang "You're Gonna Miss Me When I'm Gone" from their brand-new album, "Waitin' On Sundown."

In between songs, Brooks found time to joke with the audience.

"Front row and you got binoculars?" he said to an eager fan, while another fan threw him roses.

Dunn, too, interacted with the audience. When a camera was handed to him by someone in the crowd, he took the opportunity to snap a picture of the audience with it.

But Brooks and Dunn weren't just a two-man show. They had an incredible back-up band, to whom they gladly gave the spotlight throughout the performance.

Halfway into the show, the duo, whose every move and expression was captured on the two big screens on either side of the coliseum, performed a tribute to the Eagles, a big influence of theirs. They gave "Best of My Love" their all.

Couples and singles were already two-stepping in the aisles by the time the duo performed "She's the Kind of Trouble." The atmosphere was lively as Brooks and Dunn shook hands with the audience and slapped a couple of high fives.

Those who weren't dancing joined in the clapping and call-and-response to "Rock My World (Little Country Girl)." Even Reba McEntire joined in from the big screen. She held up a sign saying "Little Country Girl" in response to other male country stars holding up signs saying "Rock My World." The sequence was a definite crowd pleaser.

The special effects just kept coming as a huge blow-up cattle skull arose in the background in sync to "Hard Workin' Man."

By the time the song was over, the group had the audience in a frenzy as they stomped their feet, whistled and all but screamed "encore."

And what an encore they got. Dunn seemed at his liveliest upon the return, and Brooks reappeared wearing a K-State T-shirt, which got a wild, cheering response from the crowd.

Under the heat of the bright, purple lights, they performed "Whiskey Under the Bridge" and then the infamous "Boot Scootin' Boogie."

"Boogie" was the liveliest performance of the night, as Brooks jumped off stage and proceeded to do some swing dancing with one of the women in the audience.

Students lobby for financial-aid increases

KIMBERLY HEFLING
Collegian

A proposed 7-percent tuition increase prompted two members of Student Senate to lobby at the Statehouse for an equivalent increase in financial aid.

Michael Henry, arts and sciences senator, testified March 17 before the Senate Kansas Board of Regents sub-committee and asked for an increase in state-sponsored financial aid.

"In 1994, 8,314 students applied for the Regents Supplemental Grant. Only 23 percent of the applicants were able to receive these grant moneys, and of the 1,884 students that received grants, the average annual family income was $14,035 — well below the national average of $20,00 for financial-aid applicants," he said.

These figures represent an extreme shortcoming in assistance for need-based Kansas students, Henry, a member of the Student Senate Legislative and Community Affairs Committee.

Jason Cole, an at-large representative on the Student Senate Legislative and Community Affairs Committee, said their decision to lobby about financial aid was also prompted by federal actions.

"Previously the committee was committed to working on voter registration and Access the Future," Cole said. "But with the governor's proposed 7-percent increase in tuition and revisions Congress made in (State Student Initiative Grant) money, this made financial aid a priority for the committee."

SSIG helps fund scholarships for the state of Kansas.

Henry said he and Cole are proposing a 7-percent increase in the Regents Supplemental Grant program to match the governor's proposed 7-percent increase in tuition.

"Currently, allocations for the regents grant stands at $2.7 million. Our proposed increase would translate into a $2.9-million fund that could serve one-third of the applicants — or an additional 10 percent," he said.

Henry said providing financial aid plays an important role in keeping the doors of state institutions open to constituents.

"At the present time, 51 percent of K-State students are in need of financial assistance," he said. "$7.5 million of federal and state funds in grants is devoted to the most needy of students, which accounts for only 7.3 percent of all financial aid at Kansas State."

Henry said this is a small investment for the state to make in its future.

K-State must look to short-term solutions

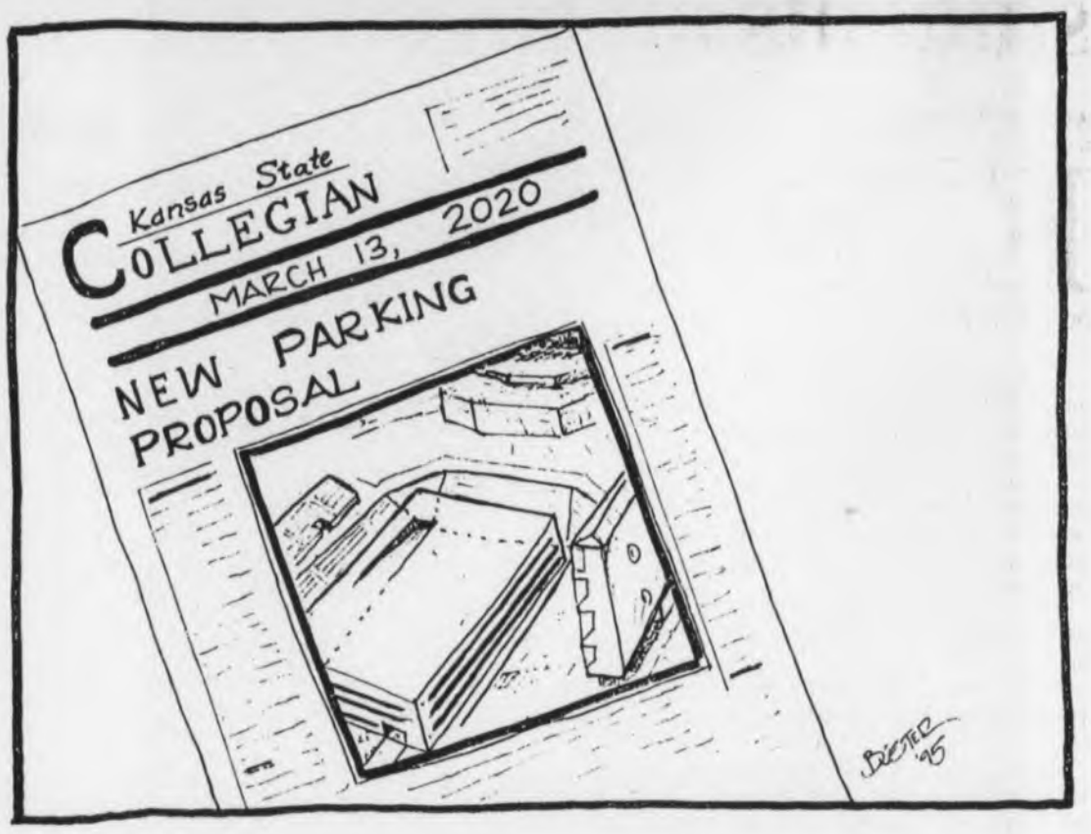
Bye bye, parking garage.

It's official. The parking garage will not be added to the K-State scenery in the next five years.

The parking garage, which would have cast a shadow over Memorial Stadium, did over shadow other parking problem proposals.

Now, students, faculty, staff and administrators should start to focus on the short-term proposals that have been overlooked up to this point.

The strongest of the short-term solutions is the restricting of parking permits to individuals who live within a certain perimeter of campus.



This proposal is connected to another proposal of making campus more bicycle friendly.

Why drive to class during the day when you live two blocks from campus? Why not ride your bike if you actually can get across campus easily and have a place to park it?

Other proposals include scheduling classes more uniformly throughout the day, looking at visitor parking and reducing reserved parking for state-owned vehicles.

Students need to stay as involved in these proposals as they were with the parking garage.

Your first step should be attending the bicycle forum at noon Tuesday in the K-State Union Courtyard.

Spring break meant work, not rest, for some students

KATHLEEN MASTIO

After much ado about spring break, I finally arrived home for some rest and relaxation.

I soon realized R&R was not what my mother had in mind. She thought it was chore time.

Our kitchen was a disaster area because it was being remodeled. I was quickly recruited to labor at painting and other monotonous tasks.

Spring break is supposed to be a vacation, but most of us probably worked more at home that we do at school.

I know now why everyone goes out of town for spring break. Skiing at Copper Mountain would have been preferable to manual labor.

Most of us don't have the opportunity to tell our parents thank you often enough, so this is a prime time to let your parents know how they helped make spring break great.

At least I didn't have to birth cattle while I was home. Thank God for small favors!

Spring break is a time to let loose, party and in general, have a good time.

Colorado, South Padre or Daytona Beach are the places for fun. Home seems to be the place where the chores are saved until an illustrious college student returns.

The fact that one is 30 hours closer to graduation doesn't make parents think it's time for a little vacation.

For those who went home for spring break, I am sure you were greeted by a "Honey Do List" — a list that thrilled most students to death.

I am now more able to relate to working parents everywhere who never get a break.

Another funny thing about going home for spring break is the strange behavior of parents. The older one gets, the more one's parents remember their small child.

At 16, driving the car to get groceries for mom seemed like a thrill. Mothers forget that wasn't what was planned for spring break.

Next year, it will be time to race down the slopes in Colorado, run Nastar and eat out. It's a fantasy had by a large portion of the student body.

Another spring break has come and gone, but with classes on the horizon, it isn't time to cry yet. A month more of classes, and for most students here, it will be over until next year.

My envy runs deep for those who spent their vacations basking themselves in the sunlight, skiing down mountains or spending money.

A cruise, a stroll down a beach or even a trip to the dentist would have been more appealing than slave labor.

Now that spring break is past, those who had a great vacation should let their parents know that they appreciate it.

For them, not scrubbing dishes, painting walls or dusting furniture during spring break is a real joy.

Most of us don't have the opportunity to tell our parents thank you often enough, so this is a prime time to let your parents know how they helped make spring break great. Whether they paid for a trip, paid for a nice dinner or just stayed out of the way, this is a chance to praise their attitude toward spring break.

So for those students who tanned, skied or shopped over break, call those loving parents and say thanks a million.

For those of us who didn't have a smashing break, I have some advice: Plan better next year!

'Secret Admirer' gunman getting away with murder

It's one thing to blow off someone who you aren't interested in. It's quite another to blow them away.

That's exactly what happened to Scott Amedure March 9. He was blown away — shot twice in the chest at point-blank range by a man he had a crush on.

Amedure, and the object of his affections, John Schmitz, had both appeared on the "Jenny Jones Show" three days earlier. The topic of the talk show that day was "Secret Admirers."

Schmitz didn't know about Amedure's affections when he agreed to be on the show. "Jenny Jones" producers told him he would meet his secret admirer during the taping, but they never told him the gender of his admirer. Apparently, heterosexism had led Schmitz to believe that the admirer was a woman.

Schmitz maintained his composure when it was revealed to him during the taping that his admirer was a man. Embarrassed, he said that he was heterosexual, and in no way interested in Amedure.

Fair enough. That is the proper way to behave when you are the object of unwanted affections — you politely tell the person, "Thank you, but I'm not interested." That should be the end of the story.

Unfortunately, it wasn't. Three days later, Amedure lay dead, and Schmitz confessed to the murder.

Schmitz's lawyer said Schmitz did it because of embarrassment and public humiliation. Apparently, the lawyer is expecting a jury will go easy on Schmitz because they will sympathize with his humiliation.

Public humiliation? Because someone found you attractive? Come on. Embarrassed, sure, maybe even a little uncomfortable. But embarrassed enough to murder?

KEVYN JACOBS

What is even more interesting is the media's response to this whole mess.

Headline after headline took aim at "The Jenny Jones Show," and editorial columnists asked the question, 'Have Talk Shows Gone Too Far In Their Quest For Ratings?'

In all the hubbub about how far "Jenny Jones" went, everyone seems to have forgotten about the real issue here — a man lay dead because he told the truth, and a lot of people seem to think the murderer's motives were understandable.

Give me a break! "Jenny Jones" wasn't out of line here — Schmitz was. "Secret Admirers" is a pretty tame subject compared to most I've seen on daytime talk shows.

The truth is, there is a big dose of heterosexism at work here. There seems to be an message of, "It's OK to hate gays."

Straight men seem to have the inexcusable attitude of, "if a man hits on me, and I'm not interested, it's OK to get violent."

Of course, if women took that attitude, there would be a lot of dead straight men.

Let me illustrate how ridiculous this notion of "It's OK to get violent when a gay man shows attraction" really is. Lets rewrite the show, and instead of Schmitz's secret admirer being a male, let's make the secret admirer an African-American woman.

Schmitz is not interested, and says so. But he's embarrassed and humiliated that a non-white woman would dare be interested in him. And three days later, that woman lay dead at his hands because she humiliated him.

Would the media be screaming about "How Far Will The Talk Shows Go For Ratings?" Would there be a kind of sympathy for Schmitz, widespread understanding how awful he must have felt, even if the murder itself was reprehensible?

NO WAY! He'd be labeled a racist, and no one would be looking at the talk show for a scapegoat.

So why isn't the media calling Schmitz a homophobe? Why is it that only homosexual columnists like myself are questioning the heterosexism, instead of the irrelevant tackiness of talk shows?

This just goes to show the level of heterosexism in this culture. Gays and lesbians in this country are still an acceptable group to be bigoted toward. People understand Schmitz's motives — even if they find his actions unconscionable.

It is, unfortunately, still very acceptable for males in this culture to get offended and upset — often to the point of violence — when another male shows an interest in them.

Men haven't learned to politely say no.

Maybe it's just that the guys don't like experiencing what women have experienced for a long, long time — being the object of unwanted affection.

In any case, "The Jenny Jones Show" and Scott Amedure didn't do anything wrong.

John Schmitz did.

▶ HOMOSEXUALITY

Columnist can't justify homophobia

Dear editor,

An uncharitable reader of Kathleen Mastio's apology for homophobia might conclude that she wants to give aid and comfort to gay-bashers. But dismissing Mastio's essay on those grounds is a mistake. I suggest that instead, we view her essay as a kind of "reductio ad absurdum."

That is to say, she shows the falseness of certain premises by showing the absurdity of the conclusion, which those premises are meant to support.

The non-standard structure of Mastio's essay makes it difficult to tell just what, exactly, the premises are, but from what I can see, Mastio proposes four reasons that some heterosexuals are homophobes. First, homosexuals are more promiscuous than heterosexuals, and like risky sex. Second, homosexuals force their values down "our" throats. Third, homosexuals identify themselves primarily by their sexual orientation. Fourth, homosexuals are attracted to cross-dressing men.

Mastio's conclusion is that these reasons both explain and justify heterosexual homophobia. She shows us vividly just how flimsy these reasons are.

Take the first one: that homosexuals are more promiscuous than heterosexuals. The "evidence" offered to support this is a quotation from Michael Warner in The Village Voice, as well as anecdotal evidence from Mastio's experience. Mastio says that Warner's statements are "homosexual rhetoric" that should "frighten anyone, gay or straight."

We should be afraid, Mastio says, because Warner's behavior represents a scary lack of self-control that can only increase the spread of AIDS. That's certainly a good reason to worry about Warner's state of mind, but why do we have to believe that HIS raging hormones are somehow typical of MOST homosexual people? If a single column in The Village Voice is enough to frighten Mastio away from all homosexuals, then the antics described in entire issues of Cosmopolitan, GQ, Playboy and Redbook, among others, must leave her in absolute dread of heterosexuals — whose predatory, risky behavior spreads a host of diseases and unplanned pregnancies! It's as laughable to use Michael Warner as the spokesperson for the sexual habits of gay people, as it is to use Helen Gurley Brown and Hugh Hefner as the spokespeople for the sexual habits of straight people. And while Mastio says that her gay acquaintances are "extremely" promiscuous, she neglects to tell us two crucial items: how she is defining "extremely," and how promiscuous her straight friends are. So that claim isn't very interesting.

Next are two claims that seem closely related to each other: homosexuals force their values on the rest of us, and they wrongly identify themselves by their sexual preference. It does seem true that some homosexuals demand not just tolerance or acceptance, but also active approval from heterosexuals. We should all live and let live, but as Mastio correctly points out, no one should be forced to approve of behavior that one finds objectionable. Unfortunately for her, it is simply not true that "gays have been forcing their values down our throats for quite some time." Even if we could somehow make Mastio's idea of "gay values" coherent, what history shows us is that gay people have been trying to force HUMAN values down "our" throats — such as respect for others' differences and the rejection of discrimination, harassment and persecution as acceptable ways to treat other people. (Are these some of the "mainstream values" that she thinks homosexuals shun?) Mastio's remarks show us that broad, sweeping claims about what ALL gays have been doing, or what ALL gays want, represent a sure path to error.

Similarly, her charge that homosexuals are wrong to identify themselves by their sexuality is both confused and probably wrong, even if it is based on her experience with gay people. Perhaps the gay people she's met are quick to identify themselves as gay, but that doesn't prove that all, or even most, gay people are the same. She should be well aware, in fact, that many gay people DON'T identify themselves as gay and spend many painful years hiding that part of themselves.

Mastio doesn't explain why identifying oneself as gay should count as a "problem" for heterosexuals, any more than my identifying myself as left-handed should be a "problem" for right-handers to hear. If she replies that handedness and sexual orientation are completely different, then she's given up the game: In a world where heterosexuals make an issue of homosexuality, it makes perfect sense that homosexuals will ALSO make their sexuality an issue, especially if they are the targets for hatred and persecution because of that sexuality! Once again, Mastio has cleverly shown us that these two reasons for homophobia are not very well thought out.

Finally is the claim that homosexuals are attracted to cross-dressing men. It is here that the "reductio" becomes its most "absurdum." First, we notice, if we haven't already, that Mastio's entire discussion is directed at homosexual MEN. This makes us wonder how we should feel about homosexual women, and how we should feel about the majority of gay men — who AREN'T attracted to cross-dressers. Then, we learn that a man's attraction to a cross-dressing man "directly contradict(s)" his alleged sexual preference, and furthermore, is somehow incompatible with monogamy itself.

These problems cause heterosexuals to "question the validity of homosexuality."

As she has done throughout her essay, Mastio presents these statements without critically evaluating them. After all, she doesn't need to. She simply allows them to stand in the full brilliance of their absurdity.

Students aren't just learning the 3 R's anymore

Program can give students an edge

KRISTIN BRIGHTON
Collegian

Education used to be only about the ABCs and 123s and a whole bunch of R's.

It is the recent addition of the initials OBE that have created confusion both inside and outside of the current educational system.

"I think it is the most misunderstood part of education right now," Gail Shroyer, assistant professor of elementary education, said about Outcome-Based Education.

"We wouldn't be having problems with it if we understood it," she said.

OBE is an educational practice designed to prepare students for life, not just for college or a job.

Many educators, like Shroyer, see the origins of the controversy out of a misunderstanding of the idea, its terminology and a general fear of change.

Cheryl Yunk, assistant principal of Manhattan High School and an active leader in the adoption of OBE into Manhattan schools, said OBE was created in response to reports in the 1980s about the problems with education, including the famous "A Nation at Risk" report.

That report and other studies reported students come out of school and do not know everything they should, Yunk said.

Outcomes, Yunk said, are the answer to the question, "Well, what do you want of students when they leave school?"

As more is learned about education, Yunk said, adjustments are made. She said many of the same people who demanded change after the '80s are now wanting to go back to old methods.

"We are going around in circles," Yunk said. "People are afraid of change."

Cindi Schroeder, a MHS computer programming teacher and the school's instructional facilitator, said OBE makes teachers more accountable for what they are teaching and makes them think more about what students need to be able to do when they leave school.

She said it is the name and the confusion of what it means that bothers people.

"It is just a phrase," Schroeder said, adding that OBE is sometimes called Performance-Based Education. "Who cares what we call it. It is just good teaching."

To give this teaching method more focus, the Manhattan-Ogden district has adopted six primary outcomes for its schools.

Simply put, the goal is for students to become effective communicators, self-directed learners, complex thinkers, quality producers, collaborative workers and community contributors.

The outcomes, Yunk said, link to what a group of Kansas business people surveyed in 1989 said they wanted in prospective employees.

She said respondents did not say they wanted employees who know math or social studies, but rather, people that know how, for example, to work as a team.

"We, too, looked at the global picture," Yunk said.

The outcomes were created through a committee of 200 to 300 people.

These local goals are taught to students through learning the basics under OBE methods.

Bill Spady, a founder of OBE, said in an interview in Educational Leadership magazine that OBE is based on four principles: clarity of focus, expanded opportunity, high expectations and design down.

■ Clarity of Focus

All curriculum is focused on gearing students toward outcomes designed both for the class and the district.

Shroyer defines outcomes as a way of looking at the end product and deciding what characteristics the student should possess at a certain point — the end of the class, the end of the year or even the end of their formal education.

"You look at the end product — what can you make them look like at the end of first grade," Shroyer said.

Schroeder gave an example of how outcomes are intermixed with basic learning in her classroom.

Before OBE's arrival in her programming classes, students did not work together. Now, in addition to individual studies, students also do projects within which they must learn to depend on each other and to work together to finish all the steps.

Now, besides learning computer commands, student in her classroom learn how to be collaborative workers and complex thinkers.

■ Expanded Opportunity

Schools expand the ways and number of times students get a chance to learn and to demonstrate, at a very high level, what they should learn.

Schroeder said education should be based on learning, not on time. Students should be given multiple opportunities to demonstrate skills.

The importance should not be for students to immediately demonstrate the skill, but on what they can learn over a longer period of time, she said.

■ High Expectations

All educators must believe that all students are able to do significant things at the end of their educational experience.

In other words, all children can succeed.

Yunk said OBE allows for multiple intelligences.

An example of this is some students learn through more abstract methods instead of analytical ones.

Instead of traditional testing methods, students could be assessed instead by demonstrating information in different ways like writing plays or poems, building a model or conducting a research experiment.

Yunk said schools often focus more on logic-based evaluations.

But, for example, if a student were more creative than analytic, some testing practices would not be geared toward their strengths as much as to other students.

■ Design Down

This is a theory of designing curriculum backwards from where you want students to end up.

Yunk said teachers used to let the textbooks determine the curriculum and the order of presentation.

"In the past, we went through the chapter moving forward. Then we figured out what kind of test we wanted to give," Yunk said. "Don't let the textbook pages tell you how to teach."

PREPARING FOR THE WORKFORCE

According to 1,773 Kansas businesses, traditional subjects and aptitudes are not as important as life skills. These are the skills an employer looks for in an applicant.

Problem Solving	72

Myths abound about Outcome-Based Education program

KRISTIN BRIGHTON
Collegian

Surrounding anything new or controversial are misconceptions, rumors and myths sprouting like summer weeds.

The theory of Outcome-Based Education has its own set of dandelions.

Gail Shroyer, assistant professor of elementary education, defined four myths or concerns people have about OBE.

The first involves the relationship between OBE and the state's Quality Performance Accreditation program and what falls under each. The programs are not the same, but they are somewhat interrelated.

OBE is a practice designed to prepare students for life, not simply a job or college. It is designed around outcomes set by districts for what characteristics they would like to see in their students as they leave school.

With OBE acting as an umbrella concept, QPA is the state program designed to assess schools in traditional education areas, Shroyer said.

Schools used to be accredited through quantitative counts of things, like the number of books in the library.

But QPA is also a process of looking at outcomes and evaluating schools on how students meet the outcomes, Shroyer said.

"It is a huge step forward to accredit schools based on academics," Shroyer said.

Cheryl Yunk, assistant principal at Manhattan High School, said the state accredits schools based on outcomes the state has identified.

She said these outcomes differ from the district's own six outcomes, but the concepts are similar.

The district's outcomes are for students to be effective communicators, self-directed learners, complex thinkers, quality producers, collaborative workers and community contributors.

Students learn these outcomes while learning basic skills.

The state looks for teamwork, problem solving, creative thinking, goal setting, communication skills and how students learn to learn in addition to basic skills.

Shroyer said QPA's tests are not easy.

"We are asking students to achieve a higher level of achievement," Shroyer said. "All kids in Manhattan have to strive toward success. The test requires them to do that."

A second myth about OBE is that the practice is an excuse for schools to teach students values, Shroyer said.

She said schools often teach students what are called life skills, which include confidence, caring, problem solving, initiative, patience, cooperation, hard work and participation.

"Teachers have been dealing with these and other issues since schools were created," Shroyer said. "These are skills people need to be functioning adults in society."

Yunk said schools always have taught values, such as not to cheat or be disrespectful of others.

"When you work with human beings, you are teaching values," Yunk said.

Cindi Schroeder, MHS programming teacher and instructional facilitator, said she does not understand why some opponents call OBE values education.

"Maybe they think being a collaborative worker is a value," she said.

The third misconception deals with the idea that grades have

Join the lively, bawdy pilgrims on the local vicarage lawn for the finals of the annual Geoffrey Chaucer Storytelling Competition. Tales are told of love, lust and laughter. Some are traditional and visual; others are, in the funniest and most good humored way, a little less delicate. The New Vic's raunchy and rambunctious rendering is not perhaps one for purists, but is definitely one that would have Chaucer rolling in the aisles.

NCAAs have been difficult to predict

I'm glad I refrained from entering any NCAA Tournament pools this year.

I saved face as well as a few bucks.

DEREK SIMMONS

Here's a look at my Final Four wish list, probably not uncommon picks:

■ Kansas. I thought the Jayhawks were a sure thing playing in Allen Fieldhouse East, aka Kemper Arena in Kansas City, Mo. Kansas made Connecticut look silly on the same floor in January.

But inexperience in the form of youth did in Kansas. Freshmen Raef LaFrentz and Billy Thomas were just finishing high-school ball at this time last year.

Jerod Haase, Jacque Vaughn and Scot Pollard are all sophomores.

Pollard had said earlier in the week that shaving the day of the game was his four-leaf clover. He's one of few that probably even owns a razor.

Choke city. Big time.

And to think I almost put this group in the championship game.

However, they will fill that spot next year.

■ Kentucky. Ummm, fellas, the ball is supposed to go in the basket.

The Wildcats shot worst when they needed good shooting the most in losing to North Carolina.

Kentucky, known for its potent shooting from anywhere on the floor, made offense look ugly in its worst shooting performance of the season (21-for-75, 28 percent).

The Wildcats came into the tournament on an 11-game winning streak and looked like champion material, winning their first three NCAA games by an average of 30 points.

Looks like Kentucky should have saved some of those points.

I thought Sports Illustrated was loony with its choice of Jerry Stackhouse as Player of the Year.

How about Joe Smith, Lou Roe, Ed O'Bannon or Shawn Respert?

How about teammate Rasheed Wallace?

I mean, come on, SI picked Arizona to win the national championship in football.

But after the Kentucky-North Carolina contest I also agreed with SI on Stackhouse: 18 points, 12 rebounds, 6 assists — and this guy's just a sophomore.

Stackhouse could easily lead the Tar Heels to the title.

■ UCLA. Finally, a winner.

Not only did I pick UCLA for a Final Four contestant, but I chose the Bruins as champs.

If it wasn't for Missouri's mannequin defense, I wouldn't have any of the four right.

I don't understand the Tigers' strategy on the last play.

Maybe Norm Stewart told the guys, "If we give them enough stationary objects to dribble around, they won't have time for a last shot.

Don't move. Just spread out, stand there and look stupid."

At least Norm had the last part right.

One of the reasons I want UCLA to take the title is to shut up Bill Walton.

Have you heard this guy ramble about how good UCLA was with him and how bad they are with Jim Harrick? Every time Walton opens his mouth I cringe.

■ Massachusetts. Would you believe I had Oklahoma State but marked the Cowboys out after watching Oklahoma bow to lowly Manhattan?

I put OSU in the Final Four, beating Wake Forest and UMass to advance, but after the Sooners' premature exit I deemed it impossible.

I scratched OSU out with my pen so you could barely read it and put UMass in the Final Four and Wake in the Elite Eight.

This Oklahoma State team making its first Final Four appearance since 1951 is the same team that left Bramlage Coliseum with a loss and a 9-5 record.

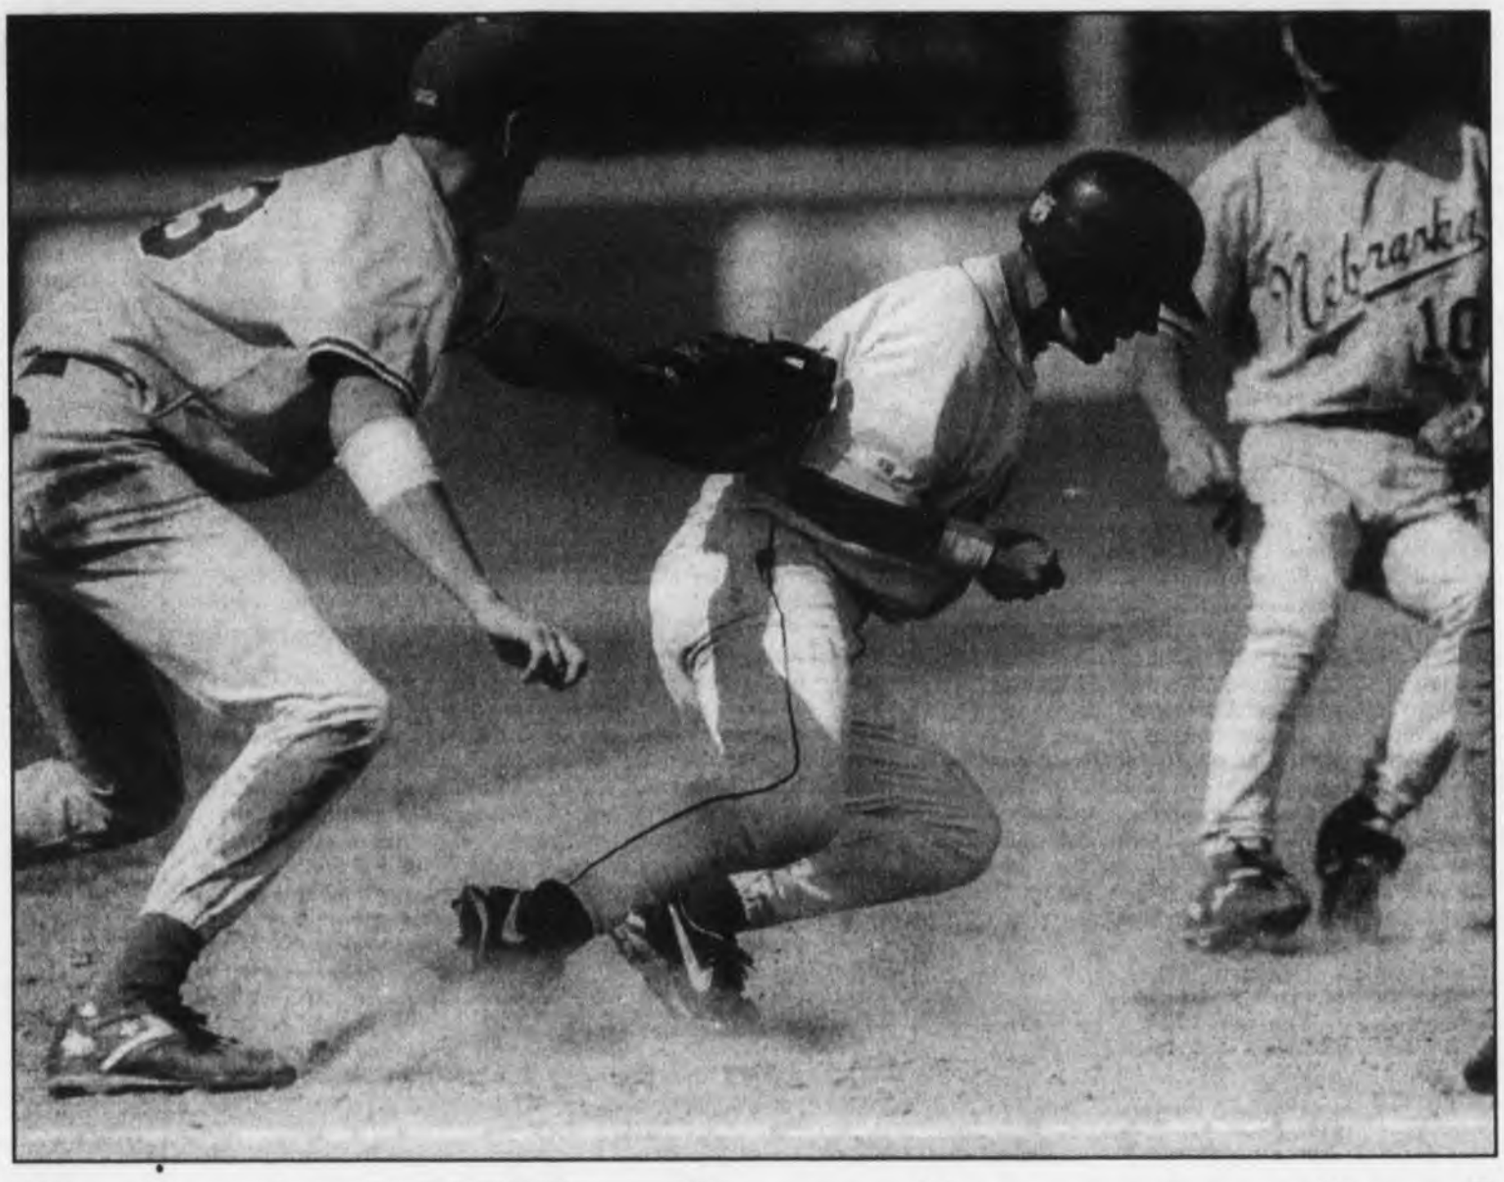
K-State made Bryant "Big Country" Reeves look like a Big Phony in the Wildcats' 74-66 victory, limiting him to just two second-half field goals.

But after a solid Big Eight Conference campaign and a league tournament championship, Oklahoma State looked as if it could ride Big Country's shoulders through the tournament.

If the Cowboys could continue to play that suffocating defense, I thought they might make it.

That unrelenting defensive pressure made the difference.

Can Oklahoma State beat UCLA? And could the Cowboys walk away from Seattle with a title?



Well, no and no.

Although I'll be pulling for Oklahoma State — moreover the Big Eight — UCLA and North Carolina should vie for the championship. And yes, I still think UCLA will take it.

I just wish Harrick could dump a bucket of Gatorade on Walton afterward and ask, "What do you think now, Billy?"

Of course, with my tournament-pool record, watch for any team but UCLA.

Hey, at least I didn't pick Villanova.

Nebraska's Todd Sears and Scott Wulfing get K-State catcher Chris Brouchard in a pitch out during the bottom of the sixth inning of the first game Sunday afternoon. Bouchard was tagged out, and Nebraska went on to win the first game 16-11, but K-State came back to win the second game of the doubleheader 8-7.

Cats beat Huskers in extra innings

PHILL SPIKER
Collegian

K-State got what it needed: a Big Eight victory.

The Wildcats went 3-3 during spring break, including a dramatic come-from-behind win over Nebraska Sunday evening for their first Big Eight victory of the year.

The Cats took two of three from the Iowa Hawkeyes but could only savage one out of three against Nebraska.

Huskers 16
K-State 11
K-State 8
Huskers 7

The Cats lost the first game of a doubleheader Sunday to Nebraska 16-11.

K-State was paced by sophomore Scott Poepard, who went four for five with three RBIs, two runs scored and a home run.

Nebraska was led by Alvie Shepherd, who went three for five, and Matt Meyer, who went two for three.

Both Huskers had four RBIs each.

Larry Walty got the loss, dropping his record to 0-3, and Jonas Armenta got the win, raising his record to 4-0.

K-State opened the scoring in the second game when Todd Fereday scored on a bases-loaded walk.

Matt Miller then hit a strong single to right, scoring Brad Harker and Poepard to give K-State a 3-0 lead after one inning of play.

The Cats led most of the game until Nebraska's Darin Erstad blasted a two-run homer to give the Huskers the lead in the seventh.

Nebraska would hold its one-run lead until the Cats rallied in the bottom of the ninth to tie the game 5-5 and send the game into extra frames.

Nebraska opened the 10th with a single by Erstad and a Mel Motley walk.

Both runners would advance on a passed ball by K-State catcher Chris Bouchard. Husker first baseman Todd Sears received an intentional walk to load the bases for David Crain, who hit into an RBI force out that gave Nebraska a 6-5 lead.

Motley scored on a wild pitch that extended the Huskers' advantage to 7-5.

"We did things right that inning — until that wild pitch," said K-State coach Mike Clark, whose team went to 9-9 overall and 1-4 in Big Eight play.

With the Cats down by two going into the bottom of the 10th, a K-State victory didn't seem possible, but K-State wasn't ready to throw in the towel quite yet.

Bouchard reached first on a Nebraska error and then advanced to second on a single by Matt Miller to set the table for some late-game heroics by K-State junior David Hendrix.

"During the half-inning, Coach told me that if the tying run got on base, I would get it," Hendrix said.

Clark said all he wanted was for Hendrix to get a shot at winning the game.

"We just wanted that one shot with Dave," Clark said.

Hendrix got that shot, crushing a three-run blast into the right field pine trees to give K-State an 8-7 victory.

K-State was led by Miller, who went three for five with two RBIs. Fereday also went two for three with a run scored.

Nebraska was led by Erstad, who went four for five with four RBIs, two runs scored and a home run.

Jon Albrecht (1-0) got his first win of the year, giving up only one hit and two earned runs in three innings.

Shepherd got the loss, dropping his record to 1-2.

Hendrix said winning the last game was something that had to be done.

"It's a big win for us," Hendrix said. "We lost the first two. So this was a must-win for us."

Despite losing the first two games of the series, Clark said the Cats never gave up on winning.

"The kids just kept competing," Clark said.

"They did a good job."

"We just wanted that one shot with Dave."

Cats take home two championships during spring break in Texas

WESS HUDELSON
Collegian

Spring break was good to the women's track team.

March 18 it captured the team championship at the College Station Relays at Texas A&M.

Saturday the women swept all 11 running events, set three records and won the dual competition with Southwest Texas University at San Marcos, Texas.

The men finished seventh at the College Station Relays with 32 points and outscored Southwest Texas 105-1/2 to 67-1/2.

"I thought we competed well, but we can do a lot better," Coach Cliff Rovelto said.

Nicole Green won the 400 meters at Texas A&M with a time of 52.60 seconds.

The time surpassed the NCAA automatic qualifying standard.

Fighting through heavy winds, Green also won the event at Southwest Texas with a time of 56.29.

Karissa Owens won the 100 meters with a time of 11.73 at College Station. Owens captured the event at Southwest Texas with a wind-aided time of 11.45.

"Karissa had some good races at both meets," Rovelto said.

"Both of those times were significant PRs."

Kristen and Kirsten Schultz picked up where they left off last season in the javelin.

Kristen finished second in the javelin with a toss of 163 feet 1 inch.

Kirsten finished third with a distance of 159'. Both distances provisionally qualify them for the NCAA Championships.

Senior Gwen Wentland finished third in the elite division of the heptathlon with 5,063 points.

Wentland cleared 6'4" in the high jump while competing in the heptathlon.

That height ties the American record owned by Jackie Joyner-Kersee.

"This was a meet we really wanted to do some things in," Rovelto said.

"The women's team looks strong in all areas. We don't really have a weak spot."

The men's team is still battling injuries.

Several athletes did not make the trip.

"We still don't have everybody on the table yet," Rovelto said. "The kids that were there did a good job. We just need to get some people healthy, and we'll be fine."

Itai Margalit and Ed Broxterman placed second and third respectively in the high jump at the College Station Relays. Both cleared 7'3/4".

Matt Jeffrey took third in the intermediate division of the decathlon with a total of 6,591.

At Southwest Texas, Senior Bill Fields walked away with two first-place finishes in the 100 meters and 200 meters.

K-State's next action is the KSU Open Saturday at R.V. Christian Track.

It is the Wildcats' only home meet of the season.

New commissioner is named

ASSOCIATED PRESS

IRVING, Texas — The Southwest Conference's Steve Hatchell was named Sunday the new commissioner of the Big Twelve Conference, which will begin play in 1996.

Hatchell and Kansas athletic director Bob Frederick met a final time with presidents and chief executive officers of the universities on Sunday at a hotel near the Dallas-Fort Worth airport.

Hatchell, 48, was sports-information director at the University of Colorado and later was director of the Big Eight Conference's service bureau and associate and interim commissioner.

His strengths are his bowl ties, marketing, and TV and broadcast contacts.

The interviews Sunday were the deciding factor in what Jon Wefald, K-State president and search committee chairman, had called a "close race." Seven votes were needed to select the new commissioner.

The schools of the Big Eight, plus Texas, Texas A&M, Texas Tech and Baylor of the Southwest Conference will create the Big Twelve. The Big Twelve will begin business operations on July 1, 1996.

The 12-member screening committee that interviewed four semifinalists unanimously recommended Hatchell and Frederick Wednesday to the university presidents. The two dropped off the final list were Dan Beebe, Ohio Valley commissioner, and Patty Viverito, Gateway commissioner.

In 1983, Hatchell left the Big Eight to become commissioner of the Metro Conference.

In 1987, he became the Orange Bowl's executive director before his appointment as SWC commissioner.

During Hatchell's Orange Bowl tenure, the payout increased to $4.2 million per team.

Hatchell represented the Big Twelve in recent months during negotiations for a five-year football TV contract worth more than $100 million and for agreements that will guarantee the new league berths in five Tier II bowls — the Cotton, Holiday, Alamo, Copper and Aloha.

"There is a lot of history in Memorial Stadium."

VINCENT COOL
Former architecture professor

Louis Kaylor, Manhattan resident, drops a line off the top of the west side of Memorial Stadium to climb with the KSU climbing club.

A memorial set in stone

Story by Sarah Lunday

A plaque is mounted on the limestone rock of Memorial Stadium.

A whirlwind of emotions is combined in that plaque. Students and staff spent years trying to raise enough money to construct its walls and dedicate what they thought would be a beautiful monument honoring the loved ones they had lost.

"It clearly was close to the heart of some people in the past," Bernd Foerster, professor of architecture, said.

Foerster said the amount of work and money put forth to raise the walls of the stadium showed how much staff and students at that time wanted to honor the K-State students lost in World War I.

The actions taken to erect the stadium were recorded in the "History of the Kansas State College of Agriculture and Applied Science" by Julius Terrass Willard, Kansas State College historian, in 1940.

The book says the founders of the stadium wanted it to look like "a real building of quiet strength."

On April 25, 1922, there was a general assembly for all students, staff and faculty to discuss the funding of building a memorial for the students from K-State who were lost in the war.

That day, each student was given a chance to pay $40 in four installments, and faculty could have the donation taken out of their paychecks. At that meeting, students pledged $76,000, and faculty pledged $23,000. By the end of the first campaign, the total pledges amounted to $157,000. The total needed was $300,000.

A general plan for the stadium was prepared by Professor L.E. Conrad, head of the Department of Engineering in 1922, and included a full horseshoe, but it was never completed.

After construction began, a shortage of funds slowed progress on the stadium, but the west wing of the stadium was completed by Oct. 21, 1922, just in time for the homecoming game against the University of Kansas. It was a historic game, and "the jinx" of KU was buried by a 7-7 score.

The east wing was finished in 1924, and the enclosing walls were added in 1927.

"There is a lot of history in Memorial Stadium, but most of the older buildings have a lot of history," Vincent Cool, former architecture professor, said.

Cool began attending K-State as a student in 1946 and remembers Manhattan as just a small town and Memorial Stadium sitting on a hill at the outskirts of the east side with crops and pastures peeking over its horizons.

"In 1946, the town began to mushroom as World War II veterans returned," Cool said.

At that time, Cool recalls, Manhattan was a small town, and most students were housed in boarding houses in town or at the only dormitory, Van Zile.

With the veterans came an influx of students that was so great that the University found it necessary to turn the area underneath the west wing of the stadium into dormitories and the east wing into a cafeteria.

"There have always been some activities at Memorial Stadium," Helen Cooper, assistant director of facilities planning, said.

But, probably one of the most significant roles Memorial Stadium has played in the history of Manhattan has no relation to sports, Cool said.

During the infamous flood of 1951, half the city was washed under currents, and people fled to the stadium, which was being used as a helicopter landing pad.

The dry ground of Memorial Stadium became an Army helicopter landing pad and pick-up area for evacuating residents.

In more recent history, Memorial Stadium has lost the limelight.

In the 1960s, KSU Stadium was built for the football games, and the events in Memorial focused on track and field events, lacrosse and other outdoor activities.

But more mysterious events occur within the walls of the old stadium.

At night, the footsteps of Nick the ghost can be heard inside the Purple Masque Theatre, Charlene Widener, graduate student in theater, said.

"I have not personally seen him, but weird things have happened," Widener said.

She said Nick is known by all students who have worked in a production in the Purple Masque.

"The story is that in the 1950s a football player was injured on the field and was carried into what was then the cafeteria and is now the Purple Masque," Widener said.

"At the moment he died in the cafeteria, his parents died in a car accident as they were on their way to see him," she said.

And he still wanders the stadium looking for his parents, so the story goes.

But today the future of Nick's home is as elusive as the ghost himself.

Tom Rawson, vice president of administration and finance, said the stadium will be in bad condition if the building is allowed to settle for another 40 years.

Although the administration has decided not to use the confines of the memorial to house a proposed campus parking garage, it has agreed something will have to be done with it.

"Some type of task force will have to be put together to see what we can do with the stadium," Darell Edie, chair of the parking council, said.

Actors prepare in the dressing room in the rear of the Purple Masque Theatre before a performance of "Smoke on the Mountain."

A dedication plaque on the southeast corner of Memorial Stadium displays the names of students who gave their lives in World War I.

▶ FONE CRISIS CENTER

Center provides anonymous help

Volunteers take calls, lend an ear to people in need

SARAH LUNDAY
Collegian

When people's lives are at stake, K-State students are there to help.

About 40 students volunteer as paraprofessionals at the FONE Crisis Center, an all-night hotline that people can turn to with their problems.

"We do not turn anybody away that needs to talk," said staff adviser Carolyn McClaskey.

The FONE Center answers calls from 5 p.m. to 8 a.m. every day of the year. Volunteers can work a 5 p.m. to midnight, or midnight to 8 a.m. shift, McClaskey said.

Julie, an on-call person for the FONE Center, said the subjects of calls at the center range from chronic callers, mental health, academics, rape and suicide.

In 1994, the FONE Center took 1,542 calls, and 113 were suicide-related, McClaskey said.

"I've seen people's lives saved," Bill Poteet, FONE coordinator, said.

McClaskey said the main thing the FONE Center does with suicide callers is let them talk.

"Let them vent," McClaskey said.

One night, Julie answered the phone and realized she was dealing with a suicidal caller.

She said she tried not to panic and looked for areas to concentrate on that were positive in his life.

"At first, I froze," she said.

And then she listened.

"He eventually got to the point where he just let go of his problems," Julie said.

Often, depressed people can see no other options to their situation, and it is up to the volunteer to search for positive aspects in those people's lives that may have been mentioned during the conversation, McClaskey said.

A volunteer dealing with a major crisis, like a suicide, is never left alone, McClaskey said.

During a crisis call, an on-call person is often called in to be a backup during the situation, and a minimum of two extra people, usually staff, are there to support the volunteer during and after the conversation, McClaskey said.

One of the big calling cards of the FONE Center is that it is anonymous and confidential and the volunteers do not know who the person is that is calling, she said.

"They won't be judged. They have a right to their feelings," she said.

Julie said that as a volunteer you have to be objective and realize that you are there for them.

"I have no idea who this person was. They have no idea who I am, but just by being there I have helped," she said.

Todd, a volunteer at the center, said listening skills are most important.

Listening skills are a focus during the training sessions all FONE Center volunteers are required to attend.

Poteet organizes the training sessions and said that people who talk to a person considering suicide either get really scared and stay away or talk a million miles a hour.

At the FONE Center, the volunteers are trained to listen and find internal and external resources that caller may have, Poteet said.

Training sessions are from 12 to 14 hours over a two-day period and go over proven methods that are effective to help the callers, he said.

Also, volunteers are trained to refer calls to other agencies that may specialize in that type of crises, he said.

John, another volunteer, said being a volunteer for FONE gives you a sense of responsibility.

"When somebody calls with a problem, it makes you feel good that you helped someone that didn't really have anyone else to turn to," he said.

FONE has been available to help people since 1969. And although the program has always been largely volunteer, two paid staff members make up the expenses of the program.

McClaskey said the budget for FONE Center during the last fiscal year was about $11,000. This budget includes the assistant coordinator's $250 monthly salary and the coordinator's $380 monthly salary.

However, the budget will be smaller next year.

McClaskey said the salaries were recently reduced by $750 a year during allocations in February by Student Senate.

> JULIE
> FONE volunteer

Poteet said he understands that a lot of organizations had their salaries cut this year, but he sees the small salaries as a problem for the FONE Center in the future.

"The problem we have is we are working in a life-and-death situation, and we are looking for qualified people to handle the situations," he said.

In the past, the FONE Center has tried to hire graduate students and other qualified personnel, Poteet said.

"It limits us to who we can hire," he said.

However, Poteet said he doesn't feel much of a threat that the center is going to be closed.

After volunteering for a year and being on staff for eight months, he has watched the FONE Center help people.

Basic skills still being assessed with Outcome-Based Education been thrown out the window for outcomes, and that parents do not know how their children are progressing.

Many believe traditional subjects are not being taught.

Some district schools have decided to assess how students are doing in the six outcomes on grade cards, then have students put together a portfolio of their work to be sent home.

But this does not mean students are not being assessed on basic skills as well.

Yunk said there is nothing that says the schools have to get rid of traditional grades. It was the individual school's choice to do so.

Yunk said these schools grade children by assessing their work according to a set of performance criteria.

These classrooms, she said, are more focused on learning instead of grades, points and extra credit.

MHS still has letter grades, but students are also graded in outcomes.

"A lot of people think grades tell you everything you need to know," Yunk said, but with portfolios and outcome assessments, parents are actually getting more specific information.

Shroyer, as a parent of students in the district, agreed portfolios tell her more about her children's improvement.

"We have passed grades off as providing more than they do," she said. "I kind of ignore the grades. I want to look at the portfolio."

Students still learn basic subjects in classrooms. But through OBE, they learn outcomes in all their classrooms. They do not take a class specifically for collaboration, for example.

Instead, students might be asked to give speeches or write papers in non-language arts classes.

Schroeder said though many changes are being made, students are still learning the basics. But now their knowledge goes beyond formulas or diagraming sentences.

Why so many men and so little time?

Dear Cassie,

I am in real trouble. Since last semester, I have been dating three guys at once. They are all very different people but I like them equally and couldn't give up any one for the sake of the others.

I have been intending to make a choice but it is too hard.

It became harder while I was away at Spring Break. I met three other guys and started dating them. None of the men know about the others.

Signed, Torn Between Six Lovers

Dear Torn,

Damn, when do you have time to study? Aren't you tired?! I have heard of collecting stuff before but this takes the cake!

Get the men together in one room and introduce them. When they see their "competition," they might walk away from the mess you've created.

K-State lectures need new focus, less on politics

RUSSELL FORTMEYER

If you want to hear about the Cuban Missile Crisis, U.S. policy on Bosnia, or, gosh forbid, how to hike around Europe for a little less than a haypenny, K-State can provide a hell of a lot of options.

But, if you want to hear about the latest movement in art, the politics of performance theater or the hardships and goings-on in the movie business, you're fresh out of luck.

Bravo to the art department for bringing in ample regional artists, and cheers to the English department for bringing in a slew of poets and novelists. Arts-hungry K-Staters can take solace in knowing that.

However, I wish to bring up the more important point of why every lecture, or practically every lecture, on this campus has to do with politics. For a campus who can't even get out and vote for one of its own, we sure are political, or so it seems.

I don't want to bad-mouth the Landon Lecture Series. That's a University treasure that brings out crowds of people. This campus is positively blessed in having the Lectures. That goes for the Convocation Lectures, too.

But there are rarely lectures concerning art given by someone of stature in their field at K-State to balance all the politics out.

Let's bring in a world-class artist. Someone who is at the top of their form.

From the stage we could pull British actor Ian McKellan or American playwright August Wilson. Performance artist Anna Deavre Smith is an up-and-comer, revolutionizing performance theater and making a political statement in the process.

From the world of art we could get painter Frank Stella or sculptor Claus Oldenburg (of the "Shuttlecock" fame in Kansas City, among others).

Of course, there is the tantalizing prospect of engaging someone from a truly American art form, the movie business. I'm not saying we bring in someone like Christian Slater or Sharon Stone to pack the seats based on star power, but someone who is gaining recognition or recently completed work of importance. Independent film directors, such as Robert Altman, who (surprise!) will be in Kansas City this next year filming his movie, "Kansas City," would offer a treasure trove of possibilities. We just need to tap them.

Younger actors like Samantha Mathis or Matthew Broderick, easily related to by college students, could spend hours talking about their experiences breaking into the business.

We've all seen what older, out-of-touch speakers can do and who they reach.

Dr. Timothy Leary was a disaster, but not to be blamed on Union Program Council Issues and Ideas for bringing him in.

Maybe we could give some artists a go. It may not initially be successful, but even the Landon Lecture Series had to start somewhere.

And the Oscar goes to

In a month better known for basketball and springtime, the Oscars sneak in one night in the limelight.

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Collegian

Tonight is the night the stars shed their privacy and toast their accomplishments.

No, it's not some religious celebration involving celebrities, but the annual Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences Awards, or, simply, the Oscars.

The Oscars is practically the only thing, outside of personal causes, that Hollywood-types come out of hiding for, mainly because they're being rewarded.

Of course, how can you be mad at the Oscars? More than a billion people watch this American treasure every year. You just have to know those people in Cannes are really jealous.

Let's get down to the nominations, as we will pick the winners and the should-be winners and give a little explanation why.

Best Picture

★ Who will win: It would be crazy to think "Forrest Gump" won't sweep this award. Everyone loved this movie (so much so they are now buying "Bubba Gump" merchandise like it was going out of style). It is a wonderful cinematic achievement filled with great performances, and the Academy will give "Gump" its due.

★ Who should win: "Pulp Fiction" is by far the most original film nominated. Director Quentin Tarantino has redefined cinema as art and created a masterpiece that should be rewarded. The main reason this dark horse won't win is because the Academy is uptight, old and loves the Hollywood studio system. That's right, "Fiction" is an independent film (something Hollywood needs to get used to) and is considered the outsider.

Best Director

★ Who will and should win: This is a hard category. Robert Zemeckis, who directed "Forrest Gump," is an accomplished director with a long Hollywood track record ("Back to the Future") and an inspiring hit film. The Academy likes to reward lengthy careers, but newcomer Tarantino will likely pick up the statuette for his brazen evolution of cinema, "Pulp Fiction."

Nobody in the Academy would dare give "Fiction" Best Picture, but they recognize sheer talent and a new master director when they see one.

Best Actor

★ Who will win: The character of Forrest Gump is a rarity. His every-man appeal and fairy-tale luck played to perfection by Tom Hanks pretty much assure him a second Oscar in a row (he won last year for "Philadelphia").

Hanks won last year for his body of work, not for his role in "Philadelphia." Now, the Academy has a chance to award him for a particular piece of work and will have no problem doing so.

★ Who should win: John Travolta as the gritty hitman Vincent Vega in "Pulp Fiction" is truly inspired. Travolta is a Hollywood mainstay, having been nominated in the 1970s for "Saturday Night Fever." He's paid his dues and deserves some recognition for a daring role and welcome comeback.

Best Actress

★ Who will win: What do you get when you make a movie about an adorable woman who is a little crazy, deaf or has some other problem? You get a celebrated actress and an Oscar nomination.

Such is Jodie Foster's fate for her swell performance in "Nell." The movie is pretty formulaic and sappy, but Foster gives us a performance even the gruffest person could love. The Academy loves speech problems, so Foster will take home her third Oscar tonight.

★ Who should win: It's hard to argue that Susan Sarandon isn't a good actress. She has been Hollywood's hottest actress for quite a few years.

She has been nominated often but has never won. Her work in "The Client" is superb, but more importantly, her body of work is extraordinarily brilliant, and it's time she won some recognition.

Best Supporting Actor

★ Who will and should win: Martin Landau's Bela Lugosi portrayal in the dark "Ed Wood" is remarkable. Not only did he steal this movie, this fine veteran actor has finally made a comeback, and the Academy will take notice. This is perhaps the most predictable category, and rightfully so.

Best Supporting Actress

★ Who will and should win: Woody Allen's "Bullets Over Broadway" is an Allen comedic classic, and Dianne Wiest's portrayal of a faded Broadway diva is as stunning as the movie.

The film doesn't have a chance in the other categories in which it's nominated, but expect Wiest's performance to pick up her second Oscar.

Short-term solutions in the works to be completed by 1998, but Manhattan did not receive the needed external funds to complete the project.

Jim Pearson, city manager, said the expansion of Anderson Avenue is a high priority for the community, and the city will resubmit applications next year for a partially state-funded project in 1999.

"It's something we need, and we've needed it for a long time," Pearson said.

The $12-million parking garage was planned to coincide with the completion of Anderson Avenue because of traffic congestion, Rawson said.

"A garage, unless they widen the street, I can't see as being feasible," Darell Edie, chair of the parking council, said.

However, the extra time provided by the Anderson Avenue delay may provide other options that are not available today, Rawson said.

For example, a project that could play into the Parking Task Force's decision to continue recommending a parking garage is the city's possible review of its own mass-transit system, Rawson said.

Pearson said a proposed $150,000 mass-transit study will be presented as part of the city's capital-improvements program to be submitted to the city commission.

The project would be paid for by general revenues of the city, Pearson said.

A 1980 mass-transit study of Manhattan indicated that a busing system would not be economically feasible. However, considerable interest for another study has been communicated, he said.

Pearson said the project would hopefully be in program funds for 1996 and that the study would probably take a year.

Another factor that may affect the task force's decision to build a garage will be the results of proposed short-term solutions that are already in the works, Edie said.

The short-term solutions include making campus more bicycle-friendly, reducing the number of reserved parking spaces for privately owned vehicles to 200 through normal attrition, reducing reserved parking for state-owned vehicles and developing a plan for a uniform parking permit fee in conjunction with specific lot assignments.

The plans also include scheduling classes more uniformly throughout the day, analyzing the policy on visitor parking, studying issues related to placing additional restrictions on the sale of permits and educating the campus community on parking alternatives.

Rawson said many of the short-term solutions have been forgotten by the campus because of the focus on a parking garage.

"People, in discussing the garage and making their own suggestions, forget about the smaller solutions," he said.

John Riedel, chair of Student Senate Parking Committee, said because of the delay on a decision about the parking garage, the focus will be shifted to short-term solutions.

Making the campus more bicycle-friendly has already been a priority for the Student Senate committee, and a forum discussing bicycle registration is scheduled to take place at noon Tuesday in the K-State Union Courtyard, Riedel said.

Finally, with the extra time available to decide on a parking garage, there will hopefully be more chances to get student opinion, Edie said.

"If there is a way to do a survey campus-wide — it would be great," Edie said.

Riedel said if a survey is conducted, it more than likely will not be the same type of survey passed out last fall.

He said a possibility is that a plebiscite vote on the parking garage could take place during a future student body election, but not the upcoming one.

"I'm not saying this is going to happen. I'm just guessing," Riedel said.

The vote would have no effect but would gather student opinion.

Clinton: Cutting financial aid, Head Start not the answer to problems abroad," he said.

Clinton said that although people who are able to grasp the high-wage jobs of the future are doing well, and there will be a record number of millionaires created during his four-year period in office, there are still many Americans working harder than they were 20 years ago for wages that are the same or lower.

The key to solving the problem of the rising lower class is not by cutting funding for various types of education and training, from Head Start to college loans, he said.

Through the direct-loan program, Clinton said, millions of young people have been able to borrow money at lower costs on better repayment terms. This way offers less hassle for colleges and universities and less paperwork. It also saves the government money because the middleman is taken out, he said.

"We don't have guarantees to banks. We just make the loans directly," he said. "That has actually reduced the deficit and reduced the cost of college loans."

Clinton said the idea that the direct-lending program builds a billion-dollar bureaucracy in Washington is a myth. The direct-lending program will save the taxpayers $12 billion over six years, the same amount of money Republicans would save by eliminating the interest subsidy on student loans, he said.

"This direct-lending program is far less expensive to run than the alternative. It is pure ideology to say it costs little money to run the direct-loan program, and we don't want to hire one government employee," he said. "We'd rather pay billions and billions of dollars to banks that could be going for lower-cost college loans to more students."

Clinton said Republicans in Congress who want to put a lid on the number of students who can participate in the direct-loan program will add to the deficit. In addition, he said Republicans want to eliminate the loan subsidy for 4 million college students.

"Interestingly enough, this cut in education will only replace the money that they want to keep giving the middleman in the old student-loan program. So we could have the same reduction in the deficit by leaving the interest subsidy in place and making the direct loan program available to all students in America," he said.

Clinton said he would be willing to veto legislation capping direct loans or Pell Grants or paying the interest on loans taken out during college.

But Clinton said he does not believe this will be necessary because there is not as much enthusiasm in the Senate among Republicans and Democrats for these types of cuts.

"I hope we can prevail in the Congress, but the veto pen is always there," he said.

Clinton said he wouldn't be where he is now if it hadn't been for the opportunities America gave him through education.

"When I was born in my state in 1946, the per-capita income of my state was barely over half the national average," he said. "And my whole generation owes everything we have to educational opportunities our country gave to us. And now education is even more important to the general welfare of America than it was when I was your age."

Clinton also addressed the issue of the National Service Program.

He said House Republicans who have voted to cut the AmeriCorps program have made a mistake. The program is giving thousands of young Americans a chance to serve their communities, serve their country and earn money for higher education, he said.

"I don't believe we need to trade in our future for what is a piddling amount on the deficit but will have an enormous negative symbolic and substantive impact on what we're trying to do in this country," he said.

Mark (left), junior in economics, and Andrew Tomb, senior in political science and speech, announce their candidacy for student body vice president and president Monday afternoon in K-State Union room 208. The Tombs said they hope to get students more involved with campus and city issues.

Brothers unveil candidacy

Join the Family.

That is the slogan of Andrew and Mark Tomb, the newest pair to announce a bid for student body president and vice president.

Andrew Tomb announced his bid for student body president Monday in Union 208 with his brother Mark Tomb by his side as his running mate.

Andrew Tomb, senior in political science and speech, said he wanted to run for president because he can represent the common students and get them involved with campus issues.

Tomb said his step away from politics has given him a chance to look at campus issues objectively. Tomb served as an education senator and as a member of former Student Body President Ed Skoog's cabinet, but he is not currently a member of Student Senate.

"Having a chance to take a look at campus outside the bubble of Student Senate has given me a chance to address concerns that aren't being addressed now," Tomb said.

STUDENT ELECTIONS '95

The two most important points of the Tomb platform are community safety and student voter registration.

To promote campus safety, Tomb proposes expansion of the student escort service off campus. He also wants to create a city/University task force on crime and safety.

"The effort to stop crime can't stop at the borders of campus," Tomb said.

The second important issue to the brothers is student voter registration. They said they think students must vote before any lobbying effort can be successful.

"The University is run by the state of Kansas, and students must be constituents of the legislators of the state of Kansas before legislators will listen," Tomb said.

They would work toward creating a five-year plan. This would allow students to work toward a long-range plan for the University despite the turnover in Student Governing Association, Mark Tomb said.

Mark Tomb, arts and sciences senator, paid his fees with nickels and dimes last semester to protest the cost of rising tuition. Responsible spending is something that the brothers will both continue to fight for, he said.

The duo also expressed concern about parking on campus. Andrew Tomb said he favors construction of a parking garage by a private company so the structure would be totally paid for by user fees.

"Parking is still an issue, but we need to take a look at other solutions," Andrew Tomb said. "The committee came up with nine recommendations, and the one we hear the most about is the parking garage."

Although it can be hard to work with family, the brothers said they see their close family relationship transferring to a good working relationship.

Groups will meet to inform others about contract

AMY SIMON
Collegian

Several K-State groups have banded together to participate in a national effort to oppose the Contract with America.

A protest will be 11 a.m. to 2 p.m. Wednesday in the area north of the K-State Union.

The Contract with America is a Republican-backed plan concerned with the downsizing of government and social programs.

The program favors cutting financial aid, welfare benefits and the national school-lunch program. It also calls for a repeal of gun bans.

Lach Franquemont, member of Students for Peace and Justice and an organizer of the demonstration, said the Contract with America contains several suggestions about reforms within the government. For example, it calls for reducing committee sizes and auditing Congress for waste.

Wednesday's demonstration will involve several student and faculty speakers on the Contract with America, Franquemont said. Each student group will then have tables set up to distribute information.

The K-State demonstration is part of a nationwide effort to educate students about the Contract with America, Franquemont said.

More than 20 schools from across the nation have signed up to participate in this effort, Franquemont said. This national organization was first started by a coalition of student groups at the University of Virginia.

Young Democrats, Students for Peace and Justice, Bisexual and Gay and Lesbian Organization and Students for Sustainability have signed up to participate in the demonstration.

Jason Cole, Young Democrats president, said he opposes cuts to several social programs.

"The budget numbers just don't add up," Cole said. "These are a bunch of election-year promises that would harm the country if they are kept."

John Prinner, Students for Peace and Justice secretary, said this program would help wealthy Americans but harm poor and inner-city residents.

"This may be a contract with rich America," Prinner said. "It is a contract on the poor and inner-city residents, especially with cuts in social programs and a lift on gun bans."

Robert Wilson, Students for Sustainability president, said his group is most concerned about how the Republican plan would affect the environment.

There is a part of the bill dealing with takings, the right of the government over private property, Wilson said.

The Contract with America would call for the government to compensate businesses for loss of revenue caused by environmental reform.

"What it means is that taxpayers would be paying people not to pollute and not to destroy the environment," Wilson said.

The goal of the campaign is to educate several thousand people about the Contract with America, Franquemont said.

"Our goal is to raise awareness of the issues," he said. "Students may hear sound bites over the news, but they don't know what is behind them."

▶ GRADUATE SCHOOL

Applications should be sent to departments

LINDA HARVEY
Collegian

Those who plan on applying to K-State's Graduate School should do so soon.

The deadline to attend in fall 1995 is April 1. Applications should be sent to the individual department, not the Graduate School.

K-State has 60 master's degrees and 42 doctoral degree programs.

Paul Isaac, associate dean of the Graduate School, said not all schools or departments require the Graduate Record Exam in order to work toward an upper-level degree. Many schools look at student credentials more than they do test scores.

"Institutions vary in how much they emphasize the GRE," he said.

New computerized versions of the GRE are beginning to surface. Even though pen and paper versions are still the most widely used, the written test may eventually be phased out completely because of its efficiency, Isaac said.

"The computerized version makes it easier for you to set the date to take the test," he said. "You get your scores the same day, and the school gets them in 10."

Rita Roberts, coordinator of testing programs at K-State, said most people opt to take the written test.

"The computerized test is a little pricier than the written," she said.

New subsections concerning mathematical reasoning and a writing sample have been recently introduced on the GRE to help tailor the test to different students.

Other tests may be required depending on the departments or schools. For example, K-State uses the Miller Analogies Test for education and social sciences students, and the Graduate Management Admission Test is used for business majors.

"The GRE is more widely accepted," Roberts said.

GRE scores are good for five years.

Congress takes a look at facts in new farm bill

ANGIE STUMP
Collegian

Farmers and the urban public wait in uncertainty as the Republican Congress drafts the 1995 Farm Bill.

The bill will be authored with the Kansas leadership of Senate Majority Leader Robert Dole, House Agriculture Committee Chairman Pat Roberts and yet-to-be-confirmed Secretary of Agriculture Dan Glickman.

"This farm bill needs to be developed by facts," Mike Doane, senior in agricultural business, said. "It can not be turned into us versus them, farmers versus the urban public. It must be based on facts and research with a vision where we want agriculture to go."

Bryan Edwardson, a K-State graduate and Congressman Roberts' legislative assistant on agriculture, said the Senate has begun hearings on the farm bill, and the House will begin its hearings today.

"There are three good reasons why the farm bill has been on hold," Edwardson said. "The confirmation of Glickman, we have been working on welfare reform, and we do not have the budget numbers."

The new bill must be signed by President Clinton before Dec. 31. If an extension is not made to extend the 1990 Farm Bill, the Food, Agriculture, Conservation and Trade Act, legislation will revert back to the Agriculture Act of 1949, which is the last permanent legislation.

Edwardson said they hope to have the farm bill finished before farmers plant wheat in the fall.

"The farm bill is a set of broad rules and parameters for agricultural production policy. It sets specific guidelines on how the United States Department of Agriculture administers policies," he said.

Farm bills since 1954 have had four basic elements — price and/or income supports, stored reserves, voluntary land retirement and food programs.

"There are a lot of misconceptions right now about the 1995

Pioneer of gansta rap dies from AIDS complications

ASSOCIATED PRESS

LOS ANGELES — Eazy-E, whose pioneering group Niggaz Wit' Attitude helped bring the rawness of inner-city rap to suburbia, died Sunday of AIDS complications. He was 31.

The rapper, whose real name was Eric Wright, died at Cedars-Sinai Medical Center, where he was hospitalized Feb. 24 with asthma, the hospital said.

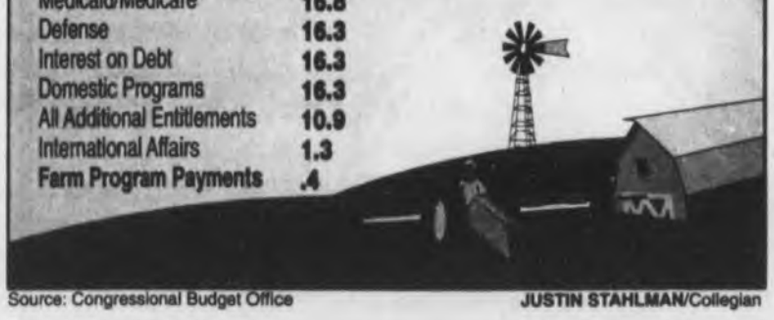
Eazy-E (Eric Wright)

"Eazy made an impact on rap music and hip-hop culture that will always be felt," said Sheena Lester, executive editor of the magazine Rap Pages.

Despite his gangster image and the harsh lyrics of his music, Wright was known among his friends as a kind and generous man, she said.

In announcing his condition on March 16, Wright said he didn't know how he contracted AIDS but wanted to warn others. His hospitalization prompted so many well-wishing telephone calls the hospital had to hire more operators.

"I've learned in the last week that this thing is real, and it doesn't discriminate. It affects everyone," Wright said in a statement read by his attorney.



Wright's attending physician, Dr. William Young, said he went on life support on March 15, and

▶RESIDENTS SEARCH FOR NEW HOMES AFTER FIRE GUTS APARTMENTS

Residents of 412 N. 11th St. have been forced to find new homes.

A fire gutted the top two floors of the three-story apartment building March 17. Firefighters said the fire was started by an electrical short.

Talishia Robins, senior in business administration, has been staying with friends until she is able to move into a different apartment.

"I'm in with friends right now until my new apartment is ready," Robins said.

Robins lost much of her furniture but salvaged her television and stereo.

"I lost some furniture, a desk, my bed and a bunch of little stuff," Robins said.

Robins said she wasn't covered by renter's insurance, so she will have to replace the lost contents with her own money.

"It was very unexpected," Robins said. "It ruined my spring break."

Randy Hill, freshman in criminal justice, said he was able to find a new apartment fairly quickly.

Hill said about half the contents of his apartment were destroyed.

He said he was able to save some of his clothes and various kitchen appliances.

Hill is using some of his sister's furniture in his new apartment. The Red Cross gave him a bed and linens.

Hill said a friend woke him up about half an hour before the fire started.

"I would have been sleeping until 10 o'clock," Hill said. "I would have been in real trouble."

Charles Herr, landlord, said he expected repairs to be done by fall.

▶CAR COMPANIES CONSIDERING FIXING FAULTY SEAT BELTS VOLUNTARILY

DETROIT (AP) — Honda Motor Company is considering repairing millions of potentially faulty seat belts.

Citing unnamed sources familiar with a federal investigation, the Detroit News said Honda has raised the possibility of fixing the belts in recent meetings with officials of the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration.

Several other Japanese companies also are considering the move, according to the newspaper.

Replacing the belts voluntarily could give the companies a public-relations boost while putting a quick end to what promises to be a long and complicated federal safety inquiry.

The NHTSA is investigating whether seat belts made by Takata Incorporated fail to latch properly.

The agency has 297 complaints involving 15 injuries, but no deaths. The agency said pieces of the belts' release buttons break off and jam the latch.

Honda was the first company to be targeted in the investigation. It has 3.7 million vehicles equipped with Takata seat belts.

The inquiry involves more than eight million 1986-91 cars and trucks sold by Honda, Nissan Motor Company, Mitsubishi Motors Corporation, Mazda Motor Corporation, Subaru of America Incorporated, Daihatsu Motor Company, General Motors Corporation and Chrysler Corporation.

▶YELLOWSTONE WOLVES SLOW TO VENTURE BEYOND AREA OF PENS

YELLOWSTONE NATIONAL PARK, Wyo. (AP) — The wolves that took their first steps outside pens in Yellowstone National Park last week hadn't ventured very far afield by Sunday.

The nine wolves at two sites were sticking close to what became home after they were brought from Canada in January as part of a reintroduction program, park spokeswoman Cheryl Matthews said.

Scientists were monitoring them with radio-collars and motion sensors.

"I really hope they make a kill," biologist Doug Smith said. "That's going to root them to the area."

The first 1-acre pen was opened Tuesday; another about five miles away was opened Wednesday. Biologists on Saturday spotted wolves frolicking in the snow about a quarter-mile from one pen.

A pen that holds five wolves at a third site was due to be opened within a few days.

The 14 Yellowstone wolves are among 29 in the federal program to reintroduce the wolf to America's northern Rockies, where the species was wiped out more than 60 years ago.

▶WALL STREET ATTITUDES IMPROVE; STOCKS HIT RECORD HIGH MONDAY

WASHINGTON (AP) — The attitudes on Wall Street have become more positive because of a growing belief that the Federal Reserve has finished raising interest rates.

The view that the Fed has achieved its hoped-for soft landing helped to spur rallies in stock and bond markets in advance of Tuesday's closed-door meeting of Fed policy-makers.

Stocks hit another record high Monday, but many private economists said the euphoria may be premature.

The markets believe widespread signs of an economic slowdown could make the Fed's February rate increase, the seventh in a year, the last. There was more evidence of a slowdown Monday with a report that sales of existing homes plunged 5 percent in February to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 3.43 million units, the slowest pace in two years.

This added evidence of a slowdown helped push the Dow Jones industrial average to a record 4,157.35, a gain of 18.67 points according to preliminary data. Monday's increase followed a 50.84 gain on Friday.

But many private economists, while not looking for a rate increase this week, said recent signs of weakness in interest-sensitive sectors such as home sales could represent only a pause that will be followed by renewed strength.

Kite kinship

Dan Brabec, graduate student in agricultural engineering, gets a little help from his 5-year-old son, Ben, while flying a kite Sunday afternoon at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex. When Ben wasn't helping his father, he and his friend were out dodging the kite as it flew low to the ground.

A house for Leadership

Residents have high involvement, grades, potential

JANICE MELIA
Collegian

Chalking the sidewalk, toilet-papering the Smith Scholarship House and cooking supper are all a part of life at Smurthwaite Scholarship House.

Smurthwaite encourages the leadership and personal growth of its residents. As a result, the Leadership Program Agreement is an important part of Smurthwaite.

"We want people who have a lot of potential," said Carrie Hasty, sophomore in agriculture engineering and president of Smurthwaite.

That potential is determined in the application and selection process of the women chosen to live in the house.

"Most of them are freshmen coming in from high schools," Hasty said.

The selection process, which is currently under revision, begins when Smurthwaite sends out a letter to all women admitted to K-State who have applied for housing. The letter invites them to apply.

If a women decides to apply, her ACT score and high- school grade point average will play a minor role. Applicants must also submit two letters of reference and an essay about why they want to live at Smurthwaite, Hasty said.

Becky Bohne, sophomore in interior architecture, said returning students who have fulfilled their leadership contracts and other responsibilities must reapply but are not required to submit an essay or references the second time.

Another important quality is the applicant's involvement, honors and leadership in high school.

"We really encourage those qualities in the women living here. If they were involved in high school, they have a better chance here," Hasty said.

In fact, the members must agree to be in at least one organization on campus.

"We have a contract with the house about the events we are in," Rabiha Abuzeineh, freshman in biology, said.

The leadership contracts involves several other requirements.

Currently, the women must maintain a 2.5 GPA, but that is in the process of being raised also.

They must also agree to be involved in the production of at least one nonsocial program during the year and attend at least two Smurthwaite-sponsored nonsocial events.

The contract also states that the women will attend at least one community or philanthropy event a semester. The rule also applies to a cultural event per semester, Bohne said.

The programming ranges anywhere from the fun and light to serious, Bohne said.

The women were involved with singing telegrams on Valentine's Day. On their Mother-Daughter weekend, there was a game like Love Connection, with the idea of "What would your mom do if ...?"

With all of the requirements, the new members can be assured they will have the help and support of the returning members.

"They are assigned a big sis the first week of class to help out in any way we can, to help them feel more comfortable," Hasty said.

The little sisters have a tradition of waking up their big sister at the early morning hours to take them to breakfast, without the convenience of showers, makeup or changing clothes first. This year the lucky location was Country Kitchen.

Terra Lockhart, freshman in geography, natural resource and environmental science, enjoys Smurthwaite better than the residence halls.

"I like it here. It's home away from home. It's very open, and people notice when something is wrong," she said.

For example, when a family death occurs, the house always gets a card and rose for the house member to let them know the house cares, Bohne said.

Smurthwaite also sponsors a formal dinner each year to thank various people on campus for the things that they have done. They also have a scholarship banquet, leadership banquet, an annual fall retreat and a summer picnic.

But with all those activities going on, the members of Smurthwaite are also required to work hours in the house.

"It's not that big of a deal. It's like a study break," Lockhart said.

Members have three hours of house duty a week and three every other weekend. They must also answer phones one hour a week and work 10 hours of weekend phone duty per semester.

Lockhart said the time commitment to the house

School board debates protested tax levy

KRISTIN BRIGHTON
Collegian

Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 School Board will soon have to make the decision about whether to pursue a local option budget election to increase property taxes.

A protest petition containing about 1,900 names was filed Monday. Only 924 of those names must be verified as registered voters for the petition to be valid.

The district presently has an option budget of 3 percent.

At its March 1 meeting, the board voted to authorize an additional LOB of 12 percent for the next two fiscal years.

If authorized, the board has the right to levy only a portion of the 15 percent.

The school board has the right to levy a property tax in addition to state funding when in the process of building new schools.

With the filing of the protest petition, the authorization must be voted upon. It would only need a majority vote to be put into effect.

At a district-wide staff meeting Monday, Jim Lindquist, board president, said the board must decide whether to pursue the election at either its April 5 or April 19 meeting.

The earliest the election could be is 60 days after it is authorized, Lindquist said.

The board must know whether it will have the additional funds by August, when it must certify the budget.

Lindquist and Superintendent Dan Yunk spoke to district employees to answer questions, get input and clear up rumors about the LOB and possible budget cuts.

"I know there is misinformation out

Cuts in student loan money a threat

Republicans also want to cut funding for subsidized loan programs. That means students like you will have to pay interest on loans while you are in school.

Republicans want to cut the deficit, but they want to cut student financial aid programs to do it.

Cuts in student financial aid may not have a significant effect on the deficit, but they could have a big effect on you.

The bottom line for you is that the government is cutting money for federal grant and loan programs.

Republicans have plans to discontinue the Supplemental Educational Opportunity Grant, college work study and Perkins Loan programs.

Republicans also want to cut funding for subsidized loan programs. That means students like you will have to pay interest on loans while you are in school.

Students could have to pay as much as $3,685 in interest while in school if they borrowed the full amount.

Larry Moeder, K-State financial aid director, said 8,000 K-State students receive a total of $40 million in subsidized loans a year.

Tuition continues to go up — the Kansas Legislature has already approved a 7-percent increase in tuition for next year, but sources for aid are dwindling.

These cuts have already been approved by the U.S. House and will soon be considered by the Senate.

If you don't want to be paying more for your education, do something about it. Call or write your senators. Get involved.

WORLDWIDE VIOLENCE NEEDS CALL OF ACTION

ERIN MANSUR SMITH

I haven't watched an entire broadcast of the evening news for several years, unable to take the almost instantaneous transmission of suffering from every corner of the globe into my living room.

I get my news in smaller, less lethal doses from magazines and newspapers. They're mediums I can put down and walk away from if I have to and take the time to adjust to the misery and suffering in my own way without losing my marbles and my lunch.

Call me a coward if you want to. Hank did.

When he found out I hadn't watched a whole half hour of news since the Gulf War, he was a little more than disgusted. He was downright nauseated.

"You're a writer," he said curling his lip and looking at me as if I were an especially fascinating sort of cockroach. "You're supposed to live off this stuff."

I chose to ignore that less than accurate and entirely unflattering remark since Hank outweighs me by a good 500 pounds, and I am not as fast on my feet as I used to be.

Secretly though, I felt pretty guilty about the small (very small) kernel of truth buried beneath his crap.

I should have been a little more up on things than I was. I should pay a little more attention to world affairs than I have been.

So during most of spring break, I watched the evening news. Hank offered to sit with me "in case I felt faint," and it became a nightly ritual for us to undergo the half hour of violence together.

One image haunts me still.

There was a boy and his mother running toward U.N. peacekeeping forces, in Sarajevo.

There was no sound, but I still imagine I heard the burst of gunfire.

I saw them peppered by the bullets of a sniper from the window of a nearby building.

Hit in the face, the boy died instantly. His mother, shot in the stomach, did not.

The sight of his 7-year-old corpse, lying beside the knees of a crouching soldier looked so small and empty. Insignificant. I have seen many pictures from the Yugoslavian war, and still, this disgusting sequence of events made my insides roll as if it were the first war footage I had ever witnessed.

As sick as it was, I found I couldn't look away from it.

I couldn't forget it either.

Hank could understand why I was upset. But he told me getting angry was all that I could do.

After all, I wasn't a politician or a diplomat. I wasn't in any position of power.

I told him that wasn't necessarily true. I could write a column about what was going on and let you, my readers, know what was happening.

But my friend shook his head. He told me it wouldn't do any good.

What would happen? You'd get angry, too, but what would change?

There will be a group of angry people.

That's all.

That is not all.

It can't be.

The sight of this 7-year old, lying beside the knees of a crouching soldier, looked so small and empty.

The vote may seem to be a simple illusion of power, and money may be what truly makes the world go around, but I won't let the idea of the strength of an individual's determination be dismissed so easily.

I may not be a politician or a diplomat. I may not be president, but I am in a position of power to influence the world around me one step at a time by influencing the people around me one individual at a time.

Write.

Protest.

Vote.

Stand on the highest mountaintop and scream bloody murder if it makes you feel it's the only thing left to do.

Watch the news.

But remember it is too easy to sit back and atrophy, allowing yourself to become a cynic and feel helpless.

I have to feel as if this has made some difference to someone, however small.

If I didn't, the image of the dead little boy would never leave me.

I don't think I could live with that.

University needs more diverse classes

"It concerns me that we are not given more of an opportunity to experience multicultural and ethnic education through broader based classes."

CATHY HANSON
senior in secondary education

Dear editor,

I'd like to take this opportunity to commend the steps our University is taking toward educational diversity. While we are still far behind other universities, like the University of Minnesota, we are making an effort by developing and implementing programs such as the American Ethnic Studies.

On a recent survey of the spring 1995 line schedule, I've found that out of 2,341 different classes offered this semester, only 22 of them are multicultural or ethnic in nature. That's .009 percent.

I think we can and should do better than that.

With the U.S. Bureau of the Census projected increase of ethnic population in the United States over the next 59 years, we need to be prepared to work alongside of people with different cultural and ethnic backgrounds from our own.

Our University education should prepare us for this future.

It concerns me that we are not given more of an opportunity to experience multicultural and ethnic education through broader based classes.

Many K-State students share my opinions and would like to see improvements made to expand our awareness.

Cost for transcript marked up for no reason

"Students have no choice but to pay these ridiculous prices, since transcripts are required for almost any job or graduate school."

BRITT C. WAGNER
senior in mechanical engineering

Dear editor,

Recently I went to the registrar's office to obtain a copy of my transcript. I did not wish to send it anywhere; I just wanted a copy to retain in my records.

The service was fast. In less than two minutes I had a printout. All that was involved was for the clerk to ask me for my student ID number, enter it into the computer and print out the transcript.

Why then did it cost $3?

I can understand it takes a nominal fee to send transcripts by mail (although $3 seems a little steep even for that). But when students request them for their personal records, why should they have to pay anything except for the cost of Our the paper?

The registrar's office does not charge a fee to print out enrollment verifications, an identical process to printing out transcripts. Why the difference?

The University takes our money, in the form of tuition and other incidental costs, stores our personal information and assumes property rights, then requires us to pay to get the information back.

Students have no choice but to pay these ridiculous prices, since transcripts are required for almost any job or graduate school.

Here's an estimated breakdown of my transcript costs: two sheets of paper at 10 cents each equals 20 cents, and two minutes of the clerk's time at $7 per hour equals 25 cents. My $3 transcript should have cost less than 50 cents. That's a mark-up of 600 percent! Whatever happened to universities being nonprofit organizations?

GUEST COLUMN

'Contract with America' will only hurt U.S.

Tomorrow, a coalition of student organizations at K-State and across the nation will join the growing outcry against the GOP's "Contract with America."

People are starting to catch on: The Contract isn't a contract at all but a classic bait-and-switch scam.

The bait is a bowlful of tasty soundbites the Republicans have used to describe their proposals: "tax relief," "term limits," "line-item veto," "personal responsibility," "unfunded mandates," and "job creation." But as Americans have had a chance to look more closely at the bills and proposals themselves, we have seen they are simply an escalation of the kind of class warfare that has enriched a small number of Americans at the expense of everyone else over the past 15 years.

March 29 has been declared a "National Day of Action Against the 'Contract on America'" on college campuses. Of the concerns that prompted this movement, some have obvious relevance for students and faculty.

For example, federal student loans, the federal work-study program, the Supplemental Educational Opportunity Grant program, and food stamps, among others, are now endangered.

Without these programs, a college education would become more and more a privilege of the economic elite, and universities would miss out on some of our nation's best students.

But there are other compelling reasons for the university community to stand up against the contract. We can't simply watch from our comfortable classrooms and laboratories as the people and resources of the nation and world are chewed up and spit out by the corporate profit machine.

And if that sounds exaggerated, just look at the proposals.

Virtually all environmental regulations and renewable-energy programs are under heavy attack in Congress, and funds for environmental cleanup will be slashed. The purpose is not "job creation" or "wise use" but rather the expansion of the corporations' ability to wring profits out of our plains, forests, seas and mines then dump the wastes and let the rest of society pay the environmental costs.

And whatever the fate of the so-called "middle-class tax cut," the overall GOP tax plan will widen the gap between rich and poor. This gap, which has been growing for two decades, would become a giant chasm under the contract.

Big cuts in one area alone — capital-gains taxes — would mean average tax breaks of $16,400 for people with incomes of more than $200,000 (not many of whom attend or work at universities) but only $37 for those making $30-40,000 a year. Together, all tax cuts proposed by the contract would add an estimated $100 billion a year to the deficit by the turn of the century.

The contract won't make up for this shortfall by cutting the $265 billion Pentagon budget or the estimated $104 billion worth of "corporate welfare" that is dished up each year to SunKist, McDonald's, Campbell's Soup, Bristol-Meyers, and others.

Rather, billions will be cut from food and nutrition programs, Head Start, job training, housing, health care, substance-abuse programs, Supplemental Security Income for disabled people and other programs.

Of course, the eventual costs of repairing the damage that will result from these cuts will be many times as high as the cost of the programs themselves, but the purpose of the contract is not to save money but to transfer wealth up society's ladder.

The GOP has laid down ground rules — rules to which the Clinton administration has agreed — that make inevitable these attacks on the well-being of students, faculty and staff, the middle class and the poor.

The rules state that taxes for the wealthy will remain low or be cut, military spending will be increased and the budget will be balanced.

This was a recipe for disaster under Ronald Reagan — producing our current huge deficit — and it can't be done now without either looting the Social Security Trust Fund or eviscerating all of the programs listed above, plus many more.

Let's spend our lunch hour Wednesday in front of the K-State Union, to tell Representative Brownback, Sens. Dole and Kassebaum and the rest of Kansas that we never signed this contract, and we want it torn up.

Stan Cox is an adjunct professor in the agronomy department.

Classes on diversity off mark

Dear editor,

Earlier this month, March 9-11, K-State's English department had the distinct honor in being host to the 4th Annual Symposium. I am assuming the symposium was to make K-State aware of the quality courses being offered at other universities and show us the need for diversity here at K-State.

What a real treat it was for this conservative to read through the list of subjects offered at this conference. I can hardly wait for these new courses to be forced upon us by the new university's General Education plan that was approved last semester by the Faculty Senate. Here are a few of the samples that other universities are offering to educate (I'm sorry — indoctrinate) their students, and then my comments on these programs.

In session 2, we learned about Christy Prahl (University of Kansas) and her class on "Teaching Generation X to Generation X." Well, now we know why KU's Generation X is better educated than our own; they are educated about themselves. I knew I should have gone to KU.

Session 3 explained Miriam Shadis' (Villanova University) class on "Taking Medieval Women Seriously." I didn't know there was a problem. Maybe we should have sent all medieval men to sensitivity class.

Session 5 had Laura Apol Obbink's (Norman, Okla.) class on "Feminists and honeybees." Gee, I thought feminists had penis envy, not stinger envy.

Session 9 had Alice Adams (Miami University of Ohio) "But You Don't Look Like a Dyke: How Students 'Read' the Queer Teacher." Maybe Kevyn Jacobs should write about this subject in his column. Of course, we will have to wait for him to finish with his public therapy that he disguises as a column every Monday in the Collegian.

Session 11 had me convinced we needed to throw out all English classes that teach E.E. Cummings, Shakespeare and the poetry of Robert Frost for Robert Miklitsch's (Ohio University) "Watching Melrose Place: Cultural Studies and the Uses and Abuses of the Super-Popular Cultural Text." I am sure this has prepared many students at Ohio for their future.

The best example of all is from session 15 by Joseph Hawes (University of Memphis) titled "But How Do We Teach?" This man made me feel confident in overhauling the traditional liberal-arts curriculum for a multicultural one.

I would like to be serious now and really look at this question. How do we teach? What concerns me about this conference is that these are real examples of what the Mulitculturalist wants to teach you. I have noticed over the past decade that our academic elite have decided Western culture is racist, sexist and oppressive. And these attitudes now threaten to become the new standard in our universities.

"Well, we know now why KU's Generation X is better educated than our own; they are educated about themselves."

PAUL A.S. RUNYAN
senior in political science

The idea that a free and united nation can be built by a diverse people who share core values has fallen into disfavor by our elites.

When they use the word "multiculturalism," it's because they want to focus on things that divide us. It is time we again look at individuals and not see people as products of particular races and cultures.

Martin Luther King's famous wish that his children be judged by the content of their character and not the color of their skin has been turned upside down. It's time to reassert that character is what counts.

▶ CITY COMMISSION

Kastner will help University

Dear editor,

This letter is being written in support of Justin Kastner's campaign for city commissioner. With the upcoming election on April 4, it is important for all Wildcats to realize the importance and potential this election has for K-State.

The most significant issue for students to realize is the enormous amount of taxes they are paying from which they are seeing no return. Since all sales through the Union are subject to sales tax, we are paying a significant amount of money whenever we need anything from books to food, and we purchase that item on campus. Please recognize that you are also paying sales tax on anything you buy in the city of Manhattan, if it be clothing at Dillard's or an Oreo blizzard at Dairy Queen. However, if the city has the right to come on campus and collect these taxes, we need a voice when these funds are allocated, and Justin is that voice.

All off-campus students are paying even more taxes. Whether they realize it or not, any student who lives in a greek house or an apartment pays part of their house bill or rent for property taxes. This increases the importance of having a K-State student on city commission.

Additionally, Justin realizes the need for making Manhattan's economic base more diverse. With the downsizing of Fort Riley, the customer base becomes very seasonal. In other words, most businesses will make the most of their money, if not all of it, while classes are in session, since the vast majority of the student population does not reside in Manhattan for the summer break months.

This means that without the recruitment of other businesses to Manhattan, we could lose out in both quality and quantity of shopping establishments. Of course, this is unlikely to happen right away, but the possibility is quite realistic in the future, and we don't think that any student wants to come back to Manhattan after graduation and see a deteriorated or lesser place.

There are many benefits behind having a K-State student on the city commission. However, this will only happen if we as students make the effort and vote. As many know, Justin finished first in the primary election, but that support must be renewed if we are to be successful. Please remember to vote on April 4, and support K-State and Justin Kastner.

▶ GUNS

Police can only help after the fact

Dear editor,

In response to Kady Massey's column "Better precautions needed for guns," I would like to clarify a few things. The act of purchasing a firearm does not constitute a crime. That is your right by the Constitution of the United States. Is Alex a convicted felon? If not, no crime is committed.

Another firearm has entered the hands of a law-abiding American. Maybe Alex sees a need to take personal responsibility for protection of his life, liberty and property. Many citizens do in this country — it's called freedom. Waiting periods only have an effect on the law-respectful citizen. Criminals do not see a need to wait, or obey the law.

"I guess if we take away all the guns from everybody, increase the police force, you and I will be safer?"

RUSSELL MCCABRIA
freshman in park resource management

Criminals by nature do not obey the law; I guess that is why we call them criminals. Why should their actions dictate what freedoms I can and cannot exercise? They do not wait to buy a gun. They do not have to go to training. Why should I? I haven't committed a crime. If I were a criminal, I want to have my background checked really close when I buy a gun.

The American Midwest has the second-highest percentage of households owning a gun, has the lowest per-capita number of crimes involving guns and the lowest per-capita gun-related homicides. The next time you feel your life endangered, remember that police can only do their job after the crime is committed. Their job at that point is not to save your life — it is to get the person that did not need to wait.

Guns are not capable of killing anything. They can be used to kill only in the hands of a person that wants to kill. Murders are committed every day by every means. However, there is a place in our country where weapons are strictly forbidden. This place has 24 hours of armed security. In this place, violent crime is on a steep rise. Where is this place? This place is called prison. I guess if we take away all the guns from everybody, increase the police force, you and I will be safer?

The United States has a very diverse society. Many classes of people exist. We try to protect the rights of everybody. The most basic right we have is self-protection. The right-to-bear-arms is one that makes this country unique. Every day, there are homes that remain protected, rape crimes are deterred, and murders are prevented. The lives and well-being of citizens are preserved every day because of this right. Gun control does nothing but infringe on the freedom of law-abiding citizens. We must not convert the freedom of citizens into power for criminals.

▶ BICYCLING

Council trying to meet all needs

Dear editor,

The good news on K-State's efforts to make our campus more bike friendly is that beginning fall 1995, bikes can be registered free; the bad news is that failing to register a bike will cause violators to be ticketed resulting in a $5 fine and a forced registration. In other words, K-State will require all bikes parked on campus to be registered.

Registration is necessary so the University can (1) appropriately monitor bike usage, (2) provide adequate and safe bike parking areas and bike lanes, and (3) more effectively urge safe bike usage.

Since bike usage falls under the jurisdiction of Parking Services, and since one of the recommendations of the Parking Survey Committee was to make our campus more bike friendly, the Parking Council decided to make the cost of bike registration free to all bikers who register their bikes. Bike registration, however, is not without some expense, such as administrative costs, printing of bike regulations, monitoring bike usage, providing permits, etc.

"Clearly, the Parking Council wants to do everything feasible to ensure a bike-friendly campus, in part to help alleviate car congestion."

PHIL ANDERSON
Parking Council member

The Parking Council decided to let Parking Services finance (from auto permits and misuse fees) the cost of bike registration. In addition, bike misuse fees will be used exclusively for improving bike facilities on campus. Clearly, the Parking Council wants to do everything feasible to ensure a bike-friendly campus, in part to help alleviate car congestion.

There are also significant improvements in the works to further enhance campus bike usage. This summer, a 12-foot wide concrete walkway/bikeway will be constructed from Throckmorton Hall at Denison and Claflin to Kimball Avenue (bordering the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex and the football stadium) turning the corner on College Avenue. The walkway/bikeway will be fully lighted, further improving campus accessibility and safety.

The recent annexation of K-State has also resulted in Manhattan using part of those additional tax revenues to improve bike accessibility for the University. Funding for that project will be approximately $231,000 spent over five years beginning January 1996. Mark Taussig, KSU Associate Director of Facilities Planning, will be in charge of a committee to recommend how those monies are spent.

Regulating traffic around and through our University is an on-going process, which relies on input from many sources.

Today at noon there will be a Bike Forum in the K-State Union Courtyard. Bring your questions and concerns, and those of us on the Parking Council will promise to listen and consider.

If you've got a better idea, we'd like to hear it.

K-State takes 1 of 3 in Louisiana during spring break

TODD STEWART
Collegian

As far as women's tennis coach Steve Bietau is concerned, history can go right ahead and repeat itself.

The Wildcats' only regular-season Big Eight victory last year was against Missouri in the opener, 6-1, and as Bietau's team opens Big Eight play tomorrow against those same Tigers, Bietau is confident about his team's chances.

"We should beat them," he said.

The Cats take a 6-6 record into the match after a 1-2 road trip during spring break to New Orleans.

The team was defeated in the first two matches of the trip by Tulane and Rice, 5-4 and 7-2, respectively, but bounced back with a solid 6-1 win against Cornell.

Bietau said he liked what he saw out of his team in the Cornell match.

"I think it was our best match of the year," Bietau said.

He pointed to his team's aggressiveness as his reasoning.

"For the first time, our team had an overall look of aggressiveness," Bietau said.

What made the victory even sweeter, Bietau said, was the quality of the Cornell team and the winning margin.

"We had the opportunity to beat someone solidly for the first time all semester," he said.

Playing well of late is No. 26 nationally ranked singles player Karina Kuregian.

Kuregian, 20-5, rides a six-game personal winning streak into Missouri, and Bietau said Kuregian could be getting back to her play of old.

"If the Cornell match is an indication, she is," Bietau said.

Kuregian has also been posting victories on the doubles side for the Cats.

Kuregian and partner Martine Shrubsole are ranked the No. 17 doubles team in the nation and are 13-1 on the year.

Bietau said he liked the improvement by the tandem as the season has worn on.

"They've played better and better as the semester has gone on," Bietau said.

But the No. 17 national ranking means more than victories, Bietau said.

▶ WOMEN'S GOLF

Cats fair well in Texas

BERNIE HANEY

Two tournaments down and one to go.

The women's golf team played in two tournaments during spring break and is finishing its final round of the Southwest Missouri State Invitational today.

The Wildcats started off the spring season with a sixth-place finish in the Lady Bronc Golf Classic.

Out of nine teams playing, the women finished the tournament strong with the second-best round of the day at 329.

Richelle Bond sparked the Wildcats' final day rally with a score of 76 and a 27th-place finish.

Bond's round of 76 was the second-best score of the day and the best score of any Wildcat player during the tournament.

The leading finisher on the team was Jacque Wright, who ended up with a three-round total of 248 for a share of fifth place.

The Wildcats then headed to College Station, Texas, for the Texas A&M Bookstore/Welsh Memorial tournament.

With a field of 17 teams competing, the women placed 10th at the Pebble Creek Country Club.

Leading the way again for the Wildcats was Wright.

Wright had a three-round total of 236, which helped her finish in a five-way tie for 16th place.

"Jacque Wright has been by far our most consistent player, and 16th isn't a bad finish in this tournament," K-State golf coach Mark Elliott said.

"But she is a better player than that, and I believe she will begin to show it as the season goes along."

After playing six rounds of golf over a period of six days, the women will complete their journey of three tournaments in Springfield, Mo.

"We've had someone play well every day of this trip, but we just aren't consistent yet," Elliott said.

"They haven't been able to play 18 holes. We need to put together back-to-back solid efforts."

The men and women will conclude their final round of competition today at the SW Missouri State Invitational.

Big 12 headquarters still to be bid upon

ASSOCIATED PRESS

IRVING, Texas — The Big Twelve Conference basketball tournament is likely to stay in Kansas City when the new league starts play in 1996, but the new commissioner said the site for the headquarters will be up for bids.

"We'll see which best financial bid we get, the best place to be," Steve Hatchell said. "It's a business decision."

Hatchell's experience as Southwest Conference commissioner and his strong marketing skills enabled him to edge Kansas athletic director Bob Frederick to become the first commissioner of the new Big Twelve Conference on Sunday.

"It was a very close ballot, and we said going in, we would make it unanimous with the one getting the most votes," said Oklahoma president David Boren. "I think we got a man with the right blend of experience, energy and excellent marketing skills. We couldn't make a mistake either way we went, but Hatchell should be a major force in leading us nationally."

Hatchell, 48, was sports information director at Colorado and later was director of the Big Eight Conference's service bureau and associate and interim commissioner.

"I grew up in the Big Eight, and they are family," Hatchell said. "And I added to my growth with my work in the Southwest Conference. I love 'em all. I guess you could say I owe everything to all 12 institutions.

Hatchell will vacate his SWC post in July.

"I can't run both, and there are several individuals who could do a good job of running the SWC the final year," he said. "All the calendars are set. We're in a good winddown plan."

As far as playing the postseason basketball tournament in Kansas City, which is the current site of the Big Eight tournament, Hatchell said, "I know a good thing when I see it. I'd have to be crazy to think about adjustments. I ran that tournament for five years along with (Texas athletic director) DeLoss Dodds, and I know how successful it is."

Hatchell also said splitting the new league into north-south divisions for football wasn't in his immediate plans.

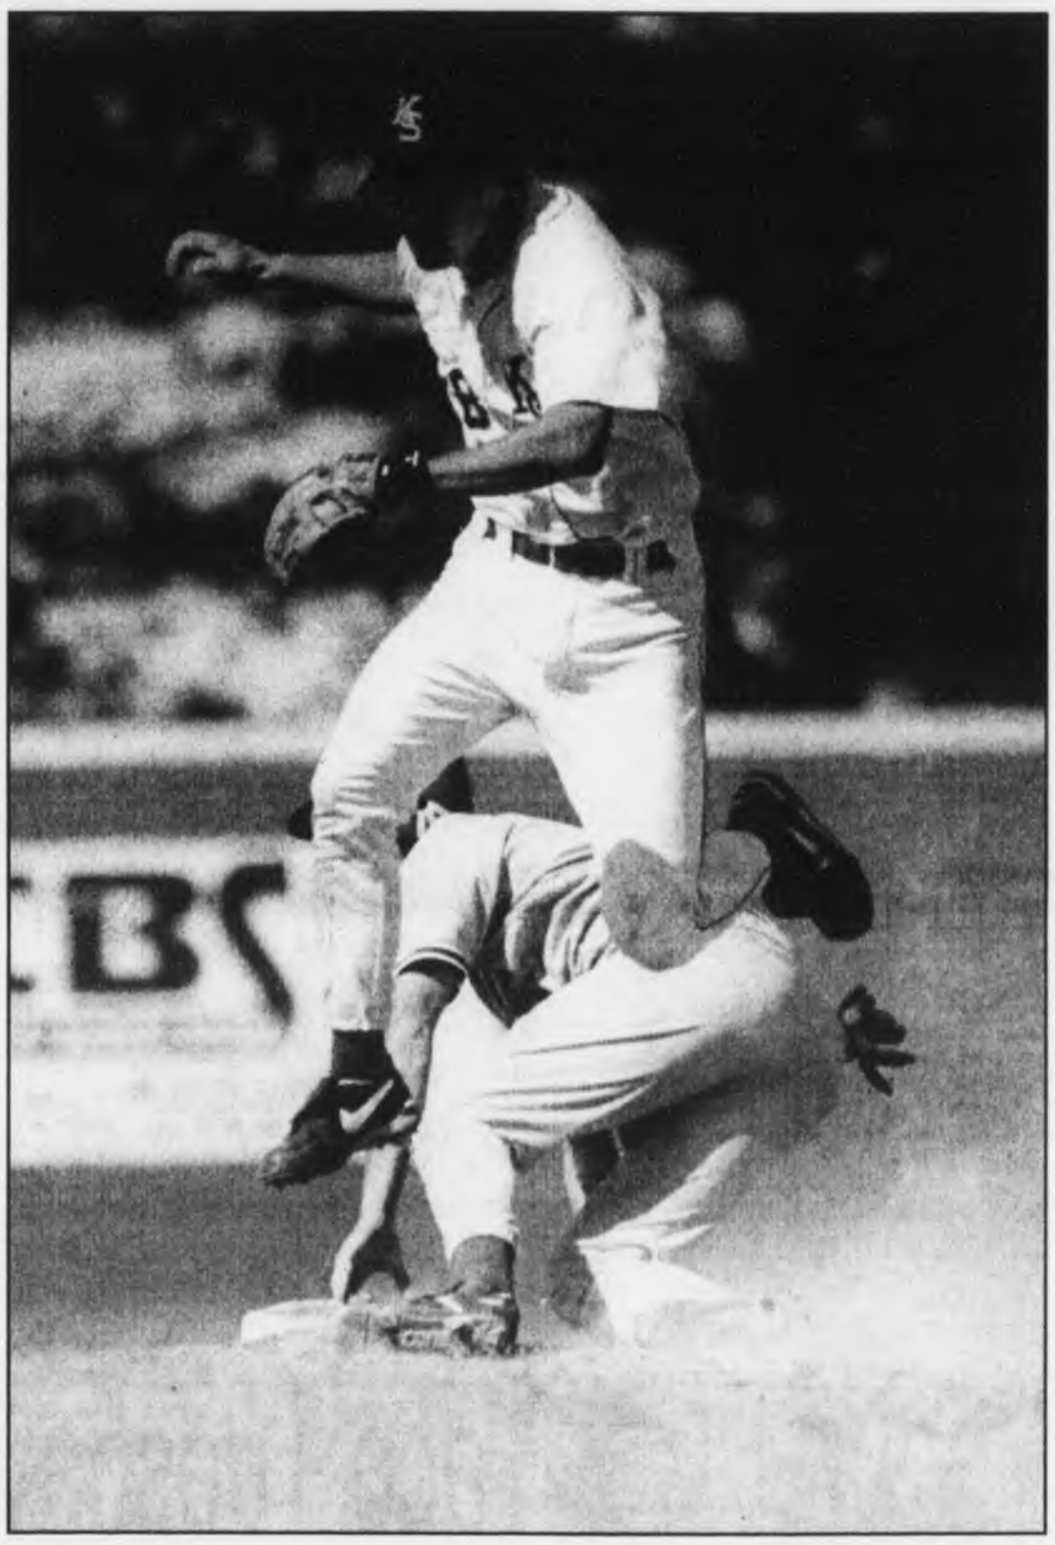
"Why get into a north-south split when you don't have to?" he asked. "You can make some money, but ask Alabama how it felt to lose that Southeastern Conference playoff game."

Martin Jischke, president of Iowa State and chairman of the Big Twelve chief executive officers, said Hatchell would be given a five-year contract with terms to be worked out.

"Sounds good. I'm thrilled," said Hatchell, who would have been jobless after the breakup of the SWC. "This is a historic opportunity."

The schools of the Big Eight plus Texas, Texas A&M, Texas Tech and Baylor of the Southwest Conference will create the Big Twelve.

The Big Twelve will begin business operations July 1, 1996.



Hatchell's experience as Orange Bowl executive director also helped sway the vote in his direction.

He left the Big Eight in 1983 to become commissioner of the Metro Conference and became the Orange Bowl's executive director in 1987 before his appointment as SWC commissioner. During Hatchell's Orange Bowl tenure, the payout increased to $4.2 million per team.

Hatchell represented the Big Twelve in recent months during negotiations for a five-year football television contract worth more than $100 million and for agreements that will guarantee the new league berths in five Tier II bowls — the Cotton, Holiday, Alamo, Copper and Aloha.

"This loomed very large in his selection," said President Jon Wefald, search committee chairman.

"He has demonstrated excellence over the last 30 years. He's had tremendous success. He's dedicated and aggressive. With him, we hope to become the premier conference in the country," Wefald said.

Regis, Creighton to battle Cats next

PHILL SPIKER
Collegian

It's time for the K-State baseball team to get back to business.

After beating Nebraska with a dramatic three-run homerun in the bottom of the 10th Sunday night, the Cats will try to continue their winning ways today against Regis and Creighton at Frank Myers Field.

The Cats will open the split doubleheader against Regis at 1 p.m.

K-State will enter the game with a 9-9 record, while Regis will be entering action with a 7-9 record.

The Cats and the Rangers have never met on the diamond.

K-State will send right-hander Steve Pearce to the mound.

Pearce is entering the game with a 0-0 record, an 11.57 earned run average in only 4.2 innings of action this season.

K-State coach Mike Clark said he is going to try to give his pitching staff some more innings during the doubleheader.

"We'll probably try to divide that up a little," Clark said. "We are going to try to get some guys who haven't got a lot of innings some innings."

K-State will be entering the contest averaging more than eight runs and 10 hits per game.

Despite the Cats' abundance of offense this season, Clark said it's the pitching that is his big concern.

"The more you talk about it, the worse it gets," Clark said. "We've just got to go out and work on hitting the mitt."

Twenty minutes after the Regis game, K-State will do battle with the Creighton Blue Jays for the third time this season.

Creighton will enter the game with a 16-8 record and is off to its best start since the 1991 season.

In the 1991 season, Creighton finished with a 51-22 record and took third place in the College World Series.

K-State and Creighton split the first two games, with the Blue Jays winning the first game 8-6 at the Lake Area Classic in Louisiana, and the Cats winning the second game 13-5 in Omaha.

Clark said the win at the CU sports complex was a big one.

"It was definitely a big win," Clark said. "It really helped their confidence."

The Cats will be sending Matt Koeman, who is 1-1 with an earned run average of 12.34.

Koeman's only win of the season was the victory at Omaha in which he pitched eight innings.

Despite the Cat win in Omaha, Clark said he has a great deal of respect for the Blue Jays.

"Creighton has got a great ball club," Clark said.

"We need to be ready to get in there and get after it because they are a quality team."

"Creighton has got a great ball club."

DEAR CASSIE,

by Cassandra Duveaux

Reader thinks Cassie has no substance

Dear Cassandra Wannabe,

I don't know who you are, and personally I don't care to, but I do want you to know I think you are the worst, most boring and inconceivably rude person ever to have a column in the Collegian.

I think the letters you decide to print are innane and the manner in which you answer them obscene.

You have been insulting, crass and completely without wit.

Here's some advice for you: take out a piece of paper, place your name at the bottom of it and give it to your boss. Tell him he should find someone who knows what the hell they are doing. If he asks you why there is nothing on the paper but your signature tell him your resignation has the same amount of substance as your column.

Signed, Can't Get No Satisfaction.

Dear Can't Get No,

Bite me.

Deja vu

Excuse me, don't I know you?
Didn't we meet last night at the club?

No?

I know, it was that party a couple of months ago.
You were the one dancing on the coffee table.
We all went to the lake afterward to do some skinny dipping until the warden chased us out of the park.

No? Well would you like to go now?

Why are you looking at me so funny?
No, I'm not making this all up,
and yes, I have a weird sense of humor.

Are you positive we haven't met?
I may forget names,
but I rarely forget faces, especially memorable ones.

No, I'm not crazy
(well, ok, maybe a little bit, but that's beside the point)
I'm just sure I thought I knew you.

I do now? I guess you're right.
Mind if a strange man buys you a drink?

▶ DANCE

Program highlights variety of skills, styles

HEATHER BALLEW
Collegian

If you didn't like WinterDance '94, Luke Kahlich, director of the K-State Dance Program, said you'll probably like SpringDance '95.

Kahlich said it's not because SpringDance is better, he said it's just that all performances the dance program puts on are very diverse.

"One of the unique things about our program is we encourage versatility," Kahlich said.

"We refer to SpringDance as a repertory concert, meaning there is a great deal of variety in it," Kahlich said.

Two dance programs are performed each school year. WinterDance is performed in Nichols Theatre and is smaller than SpringDance, which is performed in McCain Auditorium.

Kahlich said approximately 35 students, both dance majors and non-dance majors, will be performing in the program.

They auditioned at the beginning of the spring semester and have been practicing for the past two months.

"One of the things I really like about the show is that there are a lot of non-majors in it," Steve Hoekstra, graduate student in psychology, said.

Hoekstra is performing in three pieces and practices about 14 hours a week.

Angiela Meyer, sophomore in art, is performing in two pieces for the performance.

One of the pieces Meyer is doing is choreographed by Kahlich. She describes it as a crowd-pleasing, slinky, sultry, fun dance with big facial expressions.

Meyer said since she is in two of the dances, and she practices about eight to 10 hours a week.

"There are some gluttons for punishment who even put in more hours," Meyer said.

SpringDance is scheduled at 8 p.m. Friday and Saturday in McCain. Kahlich said the two-act program will be about an hour and 45 minutes long and will consist of eight or nine different dances.

Kahlich said the music and dance styles are different from dance to dance throughout the show.

As for the props and costumes, Kahlich says they are as eclectic as the music.

Kahlich said there is a theatrical jazz piece, an abstract piece and a very bright and playful piece choreographed to a Paul Simon song, and others. A ballet to an African beat and an Italian Riviera style tango will also be performed.

Keith Banks, a 1984 graduate in dance and pre-physical therapy, will be the Alumni Guest Artist for SpringDance '95.

"Each year, we bring back a guest alumni who graduated from our program," Kahlich said. "This gives students a chance to talk to someone in their field."

DANCE

Tickets for SpringDance, which is at 8 p.m. Friday and Saturday at McCain, are $6 for students and $8 for the general public.

Blind student files complaint against Missouri university

ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — A 46-year-old blind woman has filed a grievance against the University of Missouri-Kansas City, claiming she was discriminated against.

Mary Knoch, who returned to college to get a master's degree, said an adviser had reassured her two years ago that she could still get a master's degree in special education, despite being legally blind. Professors would make exams as big as newspaper headlines. If needed, they'd let her sit nose-length from the blackboard.

But, four semesters later, Knoch is telling officials the university let her down.

"It's hard enough to study when you're visually impaired without having to beg professors every semester to bring in large-print tests," said Knoch.

At a closed grievance hearing Friday, Knoch claimed that Education Professor Mary Hatfield discriminated against her by refusing to say what she'd written on the blackboard and by giving her an exam she couldn't read.

Knoch also contended that UMKC officials minimized her need for large-print exams in a letter they wrote to Hatfield before her course began.

Knoch, who has a degenerative eye disease called retinitis pigmentosa, said she needs special exams because she sees the unenlarged printed word as a series of dots.

Hatfield declined comment on Knoch's grievance, which was heard by a panel of students and faculty members.

In papers filed with the panel, Hatfield denied Knoch's accusations. She said they are unjust, and Knoch is defensive and angry.

Hatfield maintained that she did provide a large-print exam but that Knoch claimed the type was not legible after taking the test.

University officials also have declined comment, but they have defended the school's treatment of its 300 disabled students.

Under federal law, UMKC must make accommodations for the disabled or risk losing more than $9 million in federal research grants.

"We certainly welcome and try to accommodate disabled students," said Lucinda Lu, a UMKC spokeswoman.

For instance, the university tries to inform a professor before the start of the semester that a disabled student has enrolled, said Agapito Mendoza, vice provost for affirmative action. Usually, the university encourages students and teachers to devise a plan to accommodate the student's needs.

Mendoza said that in light of the Knoch case, the university might spell out the exact needs of disabled students to teachers to avoid future misunderstandings.

Advocacy groups for the blind are backing Knoch.

"By pressing the matter in a civil rights context, Mary Knoch is doing the right thing," said James Gashel, director of governmental affairs for the National Federation of the Blind.

"Fortunately, her experience is not commonplace these days."

Abortion proposal resurrected

Bill could require clinics to report number of abortions

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — A proposal to require all doctors' offices and clinics to report the number of abortions performed in them has become the focus of the abortion issue this session. .

The Senate is scheduled to debate the measure that would require the number of abortions to be reported to the Kansas Department of Health and Environment.

The reports would not include the names of doctors or patients but would include the names of offices and clinics and their locations by city.

At one point, lobbyists and legislators who support a woman's right to access to an abortion did not oppose the bill.

Their opposition was rekindled, however, after other abortion-related legislation was introduced.

Those bills include one that would require clinics that perform abortions to be licensed as ambulatory surgical centers. Another would require a woman to wait 24 hours after being counseled about the procedure before undergoing an abortion. Both of those bills are stalled in Senate committees.

The abortion reporting bill is one of several undecided issues before the Legislature as it enters its 12th and final week before first adjournment, scheduled for late Friday.

The Senate Judiciary Committee killed the abortion reporting bill, but the measure was resurrected by the House Health and Human Services Committee, approved a second time by the House, and sent to the Senate.

The House first passed the bill 98-26 on Feb. 10, and the second time 103-22 Friday.

The bill is expected to have a more difficult time in the Senate. The debate in that chamber was expected Monday afternoon.

"This is a woman's health issue," said Sen. Mike Harris, R-Wichita, one of the Senate's strongest anti-abortion advocates.

He said he did not understand why those supporting abortion rights reinstated their opposition to the reporting bill because of other pieces of legislation.

"The issue of abortion will never go away," he added. "It's not a one-bill issue."

Harris said he was glad the bill was going to be debated fully in the Senate. He also said he is afraid the measure may be watered down through amendments.

Harris and other supporters contend the information is necessary to track the correlation between abortions and later health problems — such as breast cancer.

Sen. Sandy Praeger, R-Lawrence, chairwoman of the Senate Public Health and Welfare Committee, said she has one amendment prepared that would require all reporting to be done by code, not names of clinics.

She and other lawmakers are concerned that doctors performing abortions would be harassed by anti-abortion picketers.

The bill has a confidentiality clause, but some lawmakers contend the penalty for violating it is not stiff enough to be a deterrent to disclosure.

Praeger has another amendment prepared that would allow doctors to sue individuals or the state if the information is revealed.

"The bill isn't necessary," she said, adding that most of the abortion providers in Kansas are providing the information to the state anyway.

"I think it's an attempt to find out who they are," she said.

Religious group linked to sarin subway deaths

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOKYO — Members called it the "Ministry of Science." Police searched the mysterious, tarpaulin-covered building Monday for evidence linking the Aum Shinri Kyo sect to the nerve gas that killed 10 people on Tokyo's subways.

After nearly a week of intense searches of sect property that have turned up tons of chemicals, millions of dollars worth of yen and piles of gold bars, police appeared to be concentrating on the windowless, maze-like building on the sect's commune at the foot of Mount Fuji.

They refused to comment on what was found in their search of the building, but media reports said it was filled with chemical storage tanks and equipment that could be used in the production of the nerve gas sarin.

A system of long pipes, believed to be part of an elaborate air purification system, is visible along a wall of the building. Plastic tubs outside of it bore stencils reading "Ministry of Science."

Today's search began with what has become a daily ritual — hundreds of police descending on the sprawling commune as swarms of reporters looked on. Many of the police wore protective clothing and gas masks and carried caged canaries to detect poison gas.

There were no reports of any scuffles or other incidents with members of Aum Shinri Kyo, whose name means supreme truth. The sect, which claims 10,000 members in Japan, adheres to an amalgam of Buddhist and Hindu beliefs.

Japanese media, meanwhile, reported police have found residues around sect compounds that link them to the sarin used in the subway attack, and to the sarin that was released last summer in Matsumoto, 120 miles west of Tokyo, killing seven people.

School board denies rumor about Fort Riley connection

there," Yunk said, adding he deals with rumors now on a daily basis. "It amazes me the types of rumors that get spread."

One rumor Yunk said that continues to persist is that the district is exploring the possibility of closing schools because of the downsizing of Fort Riley.

Yunk said there are no committees exploring the possibility, but he repeated what he said at the March 15 meeting that the only school presently slated to close is Strong Elementary.

Strong, Yunk said, was reopened after being closed for 15 years to handle overflow from the overcrowded Northview Elementary.

The fire marshal only approved the opening for two years, and then gave special permission for one extra year.

The school will close for classroom use at the end of this year but, Yunk said, it might remain open for office or storage space.

At next week's meeting, the board will discuss and might begin deciding about making staff cuts and whether to provide summer school.

Under the continuing contract law, staff not being renewed must be notified by April 10.

If their contract is not renewed, staff may later be rehired depending on what the Kansas Legislature decides concerning the base per pupil funds, as well as other issues under debate, like the lottery, that affect education funding.

The state has not raised its base per pupil funding for three years.

Lindquist said the last reports he heard from Topeka sound positive.

"I'm more optimistic now than at the start of the session," he said.

The audience asked for more specifics of what could be cut.

Yunk said at a recent work session a list of 43 possible program cuts were presented to the board.

Yunk said just because a program is on the list does not mean the program is not valued by the district or that it will be cut.

He did say the district spends $108,000 per year for lunchtime playground supervisors, $103,000 for disability insurance, $60,000 for summer school, and $41,000 for middle school athletics.

One other suggestion brought up at the last board meeting is to lengthen the school day by 15 or 30 minutes.

Under this idea, the school calendar could be shortened but schools would be opened the same amount of time, saving on utilities and, perhaps, on salaries.

Yunk said this idea is being explored for the board.

Rapper brought view of ghetto life to all through music

lost the ability to communicate several days before he died, with his wife, Tomika Wood, and his mother, Kathie Wright, at his side.

A former drug dealer who claimed to have fathered seven children by six different women, Wright brought a brutal vision of Los Angeles-area ghetto life to popular art.

N.W.A. scored a hit in 1988 with "Straight Outta Compton," using a thumping beat to tell crude tales of drive-by shootings, drugs and police harassment in the tough Los Angeles suburb.

The album's foul-mouthed, hardcore themes knocked softer rap off the charts and sold more than two million copies despite lack of radio play.

Wright's high-pitched voice anchored the song "F—- Tha Police," which prompted an FBI protest that it advocated violence against law enforcement. The view of police as racists came years before the 1991 Rodney King beating.

N.W.A's follow-up record, 1991's "Niggaz4Life," sold nearly 1 million copies in its first weeks of release to become the first hardcore rap album to hit No. 1 on the charts.

N.W.A. eventually broke up amidst artistic and money disputes but proved hugely influential.

Former members Ice Cube and Dr. Dre went on to successful solo careers, and gangsta rap spread into the white, suburban teen-age market to become mainstream.

Wright went on to record the 1993 solo album "It's On (Dr. Dre) 187um Killa."

His Ruthless Records produced and supervised several other acts, including Above the Law, Thugs in Harmony, Blood of Abraham, MC Ren and Hoes With Attitude.

Critics called gangsta rap violent and sexist for its portrayal of police as targets, women as bitches and whores, and its celebration of drugs and gunplay. Some said it promoted criminal violence.

Supporters argued that it merely presented the grim reality of the inner city.

"The way I see it, most kids nowadays like listening to stuff that's real," Wright said last year. "They wanna be hip, they wanna be down. They wanna know all the street slang, everything that's going on. Both black and white."

Like other rappers, Wright occasionally was in trouble with the law. In 1993, a judge found he had fathered a 2-year-old Nebraska girl and ordered him to pay about $58,000 a year in what a prosecutor said was the largest child-support order ever handled by the Los Angeles County District Attorney's office.

Wright recently was married to Wood and the couple has a 1-year-old son, Dominick, the youngest of his children. Both Wood and the son tested negative for the AIDS virus, Wright said.

Grad students can receive 2 types of aid

"A reasonable number of people still take it more than once," Isaac said. "You're better off taking it, even if it's not required."

Finding a school to attend may not be as easy as scheduling a test date, though.

"When I went to grad school, it was a general rule that you didn't go to the same school that you got your undergraduate degree at," Isaac said.

Isaac also said if students have the chance, they should probably go to another school.

"There used to be the notion that if you stayed at the same institution, you weren't getting enough breadth," Isaac said. "Now, as an undergraduate, some may have not really sampled the whole spectrum, especially at larger schools like K-State."

"Graduate education is very different than an undergraduate education," he said.

For students who plan to pursue this graduate education, two main types of financial aid are available. Fellowships are the graduate equivalent to a scholarship. A paycheck is usually included in the fellowship, and fee payment and living expenses are sometimes provided.

Teaching and research graduate assistantships are also available. A paycheck is included in this instance, and, varying from school to school, a waiver of fees is provided to a certain extent.

Most of USDA's budget money used for service, research programming

Farm Bill," Mike Seyfert, junior in agricultural economics, said. "The farm bill is more than farming — most of the USDA's budget is food stamps and food programs."

Information from Barry Flinchbaugh, professor of agricultural economics, said that the USDA budget for fiscal year 1994 was $71 billion, three-fourths of which was dedicated to non-farm programs such as food stamps, school lunches, the women, infant and children program, research and education.

"Roughly, one dollar of every six dollars of the USDA budget goes to farm programs," Edwardson said.

Some of the programs in FACTA were the Conservation Reserve Program, rural development, food programs and research and education.

He said the main issues in developing the 1995 farm bill will be farmer flexibility, the conservation reserve program and export programs.

The CRP program is a big concern for Kansans.

Congressman Roberts' district has more CRP land than any other district in the United States, Doane said.

The program, authorized by the 1985 farm bill, targets the most fragile farmland by encouraging farmers to stop growing crops on croplands designated as highly susceptible to erosion and plant them with grass and trees.

"Farmers are the stewards of the land," Doane said. "But the cost of administering the programs is the responsibility of society as a whole — everyone benefits from them."

He said research done by K-State agricultural economists and Cooperative Extension Service found that 52 percent of Kansas farmers' income comes from government payments.

Changes in the CRP could be detrimental to the Kansas economy.

"With Glickman as secretary of agriculture, Roberts as chairman of the House agriculture committee and Dole as majority leader, hopefully we are going to see a farm bill favorable to Kansas," Seyfert said.

The agricultural budget has dropped more than 50 percent since the 1985 farm bill.

"As a young person involved in agriculture, I believe we need a farm bill that addresses the needs of producers today but envisions the picture of the future," Doane said. "If tough decisions need to be made, they need to be developed using facts and research."

Doane said he believes if we have a vision of where agriculture should be in 25 years, we should not take one big step. There should be 25 incremental steps so changes could be made along the way, he said.

commitment to the house would be more elsewhere.

"If you lived off campus it would be twice that," she said.

The three hours can range from vacuuming to cooking.

"We don't have any hired cooks but it works out fairly well," Bohne said.

Bohne said the first week some of meals can be interesting if the person cooking has not had a lot of experience.

"Last year we had someone put coconut in lasagna," she said.

Despite the requirements of Smurthwaite, the current trend is an increase in the number of students returning.

"We have a trend of more and more staying rather than going," Bohne said.

This year almost one-half of the house returned and it appears that 30 to 35 of the 46 this year will return next year.

"I like the idea it's a family. It's a home and it's a wonderful place to live," Bohne said.

Rainwater damages 108 books as a result of leaky spots in roof

SHELLY FOGEL
Collegian

Several gallons of rainwater leaked through the roof of Farrell Library, damaging books on the fourth floor of the building on March 13.

Jim Mason, preservation librarian, said 108 books were damaged.

"Little of the water dripped directly on the books, but it did drip in the aisle. The water puddled and splashed on the books," Mason said.

Parking Services backs bike fee

"I don't think there is any way by having people register their bikes and having a fee you're going to encourage people to use their bikes."

JEFF STUEVE
senior in electrical engineering

SARAH LUNDAY
Collegian

A mandatory bicycle registration beginning the 1996-97 school year might have a rough ride before implementation.

"The reason of registration is to support the bicycle-friendly program," said John Riedel, chairperson of the Student Senate Parking Committee.

Included in the program are additional campus bike paths, signs, racks and a super sidewalk planned to run along Denison and Kimball avenues, Darell Edie, chairman of the parking council, said.

During the first year of implementation, the registration will not include a fee, Dwain Archer, director of parking and fire safety, said.

"The fee will be suspended for the first year until the bicycle parking committee makes further recommendations," he said.

However, the cost of promoting bicycle use on campus is not insignificant, he said.

"A registration fee would be the beginning of supporting the system," Archer said.

The registration would support an existing program to increase bike paths, racks and the general use of bicycles on campus, Archer said.

"We are wanting the program to develop, become strong and support itself eventually," Archer said.

Phil Anderson, parking council member, said he urges those who regularly ride bikes not to look at the registration negatively.

"The registration system should not be looked at as an impediment, but as an activity for the University to get more organized," Anderson said.

Mark Taussig, University landscape architect, said he has watched the use of bicycles increase during a four-year period.

Between 1993 and 1994, the bicycles on campus increased 20 percent, he said.

Plans are already being made to implement more campus bike paths, signs and racks, Taussig said.

Riedel said the Student Senate Parking Committee supported the idea of bicycle registration, but without a mandatory fee.

John Schoenthaler, member of the parking committee, said he did not support a registration fee.

"As far as we're concerned, most students are going to be opposed to a fee, for right now at least," Schoenthaler said.

Jeff Stueve, senior in electrical engineering, said he didn't see how registering bikes encourages bicycle use.

"I don't think there is any way by having people register their bikes and having a fee you're going to encourage people to use their bikes," Stueve said.

Liz Ring, junior in history and English, and Paul Friedrichs, junior in agricultural economics, announce their candidacy for student body president and vice president Tuesday afternoon near the campus clock. Liz Ring and Paul Friedrichs gathered by the campus clock Tuesday afternoon to announce their candidacy for student body president and vice president.

Ring, junior in history and English, and Friedrichs, junior in agricultural economics, said they chose to announce on campus to symbolize their support for students.

"We feel it is important to announce on this campus because it symbolizes our commitment to the University's students and what issues are important to them at this college," Ring said.

Before beginning to list their platform, Ring set the tone for the type of campaign she wanted to run.

"We are committed to running an honest, positive and ethical campaign, and we challenge our opponents to strive for these high standards," Ring said.

The duo announced a platform covering three prominent areas: student empowerment, positive change and fiscal responsibility.

Student empowerment will help to open up more opportunities for executive input, Ring said.

Student empowerment involves having a slot for a student on the Kansas Board of Regents and continuing the student forums conducted this semester.

STUDENT ELECTIONS '95

Positive change involves restructuring the Principles of Physical Fitness class, working toward teacher evaluations and the minors program, and foot patrol by K-State Police to promote campus safety.

The pair also discussed the issue of parking. The pair favors implementing the short-term solutions recommended by the parking task force and looking for long-term solutions, Friedrichs said.

They would work for executive initiative to create positive change, Friedrichs said. This would allow the student body president to put legislation before Student Senate.

"Liz and I feel that it is the duty and responsibility of the executive branch to propose and encourage discussion and debate within Student Senate," Friedrichs said.

The final portion of the pair's platform is fiscal responsibility. They would work to stop special fees, such as the proposed international student fee and bicycle registration fee, Ring said.

The two hope to bring an active and inclusive style of leadership to student government, Friedrichs said.

Ring served as Senate vice-chair this year, and Friedrichs has served as agricultural senator. Friedrichs said they are ready to serve students in this leadership position.

BSU nominates next year's board

NOLAN SCHRAMM
Collegian

Sparking student involvement was one of the key concerns addressed by members of the Black Student Union as it nominated board members for next year.

Jawwad Abdulhaqq, BSU president, said he plans for the organization to take more of an active role in drawing new students to K-State.

"One of the things we are planning for the BSU is going to high schools and recruiting students to come to KSU," he said. "We want to help establish credibility and join together all African American organizations on campus."

Abdulhaqq, freshman in political science, said BSU will also stress student involvement in politics.

"We will look at policies and see how they relate to our campus, minorities and all students on campus," he said.

Abdulhaqq said he would encourage African American students to be nominated for positions on Student Senate, the Fine Arts Council, Union Governing Board and the Board of Student Publications.

Syvette Davis, nominee for political chairperson, also said she looks forward to student members taking a more politically active role on campus.

"We will be pushing for voter registration. We will look at the upcoming presidential candidates and at what their stances are," she said.

Republican bill might cut some federal aid programs

A bill to be considered by Congress within the next several weeks would eliminate several forms of federal student financial aid.

Larry Moeder, K-State financial aid director, said several Republican congressmen have plans to discontinue several programs as part of the Contract with America.

The Supplemental Educational Opportunity Grant, college work study and Perkins Loan programs would be discontinued under the Contract with America. Interest subsidies on Stafford Loans would also be discontinued under this program.

Moeder said discontinuing the subsidized Stafford Loan program would affect students at K-State. He said 8,000 K-State students receive a total of $40 million in subsidized Stafford Loans.

"The Stafford Loan Program is the most far-reaching and affects the highest number of students," Moeder said.

For example, students could have to pay as much as $3,685 in interest while in school if they borrowed the full amount.

"I think that removal of these programs will prevent some students from attending college," Moeder said.

Removal of these programs would mean that Pell Grants and unsubsidized Stafford Loans would be the only forms of federal financial aid available to students, Moeder said.

"Their plan is to increase money for Pell Grants and Pell Grant eligibility," Moeder said. "Many financial aid directors are skeptical about that because of past experience."

Students would still be eligible for state aid and scholarships, but even some of that money is being cut.

The House Appropriations Committee slashed $700,000 from the federal program that provides funding for the State of Kansas Scholarship program.

"The committee recommended these cuts because the program has fulfilled its purpose, and it is no longer needed," said Jackie McClaskey, press secretary for Rep. Sam Brownback, R-Kan.

The program was originally set up to make state scholarships possible for underprivileged people, McClaskey said.

Slashing the State of Kansas Scholarship will affect more than 330 K-State students during the 1995-96 school year, Moeder said. The other programs would most likely be cut

NEWS BRIEFS

▶TERM LIMITS NEXT ISSUE IN REPUBLICANS' CONTRACT WITH AMERICA

WASHINGTON (AP) — Anticipating defeat on a key element in their Contract With America, House Republicans hope to get credit for holding a vote on term limits.

But they are blaming Democrats for the measure's likely demise.

"If we get half the Democrats, we will pass the term-limits constitutional amendment," House Speaker Newt Gingrich said Tuesday as debate opened.

He said more than 85 percent of GOP lawmakers would vote for the measure.

"It ought to be possible to get half the Democrats to side with the country that elects them," he said.

Gingrich's partisan jabbing aside, the term-limits issue has had a rocky path toward this week's expected vote, particularly for an issue that commands support in the 70-percent range in public opinion polls.

Some senior Republicans oppose the limits.

Its critics include Rep. Henry Hyde of Illinois, chairman of the Judiciary Committee, who calls them a dumb idea that would rob Congress of needed expertise, and Texas Rep. Tom DeLay, the party's whip, who says they would enhance the power of unelected bureaucrats.

It takes a two-thirds vote — 290 if all 435 lawmakers vote — to send the measure to the Senate. Republicans hold 230 seats in the House, Democrats 204, and there is one independent.

▶NEW STUDY LINKS HEAD INJURY, GENE COMBINATION TO ALZHEIMER'S

NEW YORK (AP) — A blow to the head that knocks you out can raise your chance of getting Alzheimer's disease someday, but only if you carry a particular gene, a study suggested.

Elderly people who had a severe blow to the head and carried the gene were 10 times as likely to have Alzheimer's as were people with neither risk factor. A head injury alone, without the gene, did not raise the risk.

The gene might act on a head injury by turning a normal repair process into a step toward disease, said Dr. Richard Mayeux, a professor of neurology, psychiatry and epidemiology at Columbia University in New York.

Head injury and the gene, apo-E4, had each been linked separately to Alzheimer's risk in prior studies. Mayeux and colleagues published the new results in this month's issue of the journal Neurology.

Walter Kukull, an epidemiologist at the University of Washington in Seattle who is studying Alzheimer's, cautioned the conclusions must be considered tentative because relatively few study participants had a head injury plus the gene. But the idea that apo-E4 could team up with a head injury to raise the risk of Alzheimer's is plausible, he said.

▶SUPREME COURT DIVIDED OVER MANDATORY DRUG TESTING IN SCHOOLS

WASHINGTON (AP) — A lively debate about students' privacy rights and the war on drugs seemed to leave the Supreme Court deeply divided Tuesday about mandatory drug tests in public schools.

In a case closely watched by educators nationwide, an Oregon school district and the Clinton administration urged the justices to allow such tests for all student athletes in schools where drug use is deemed a problem.

But Thomas Christ, one teenager's lawyer, said his client was wrongly barred from his junior high football team for refusing to undergo urinalysis because such tests amount to unreasonable searches.

"This is being compelled by the government. They're watching you do it. They're taking your urine. They're testing it to see what secrets are therein," Christ said.

The court's decision, expected by late June, could deal with student athletes only.

But, depending on how broadly the justices rule, the decision conceivably could affect all schoolchildren — even those in elementary school.

"It is not our position that drug-testing of all students would be invalid under all circumstances," Richard Seamon, Justice Department lawyer, said when pressed on the scope of his argument.

▶LONG-DISTANCE PHONE COMPANIES WANT LOCAL PHONE FEES LOWERED

WASHINGTON (AP) — Locked in battle to take customers from each other, rivals AT&T and MCI are bedmates in another fight — taking on local telephone companies.

Long-distance charges could go down as a result.

AT&T and MCI, along with several hundred other long-distance companies, want the Federal Communications Commission to lower fees they pay local phone companies.

The FCC's decision is expected on Thursday and will affect 92 percent of all telephone customers, Kathleen Wallman, the FCC's top telephone regulator, said.

The local companies' share of long-distance charges — $20 billion to $22 billion a year by an FCC estimate — is passed on to long-distance customers.

"If these prices go down, your long-distance telephone calls go down," Reed Hundt, FCC Chairman, said.

For every $1 of long-distance revenue, 45 cents goes to local phone companies — about half of one's long-distance bill — to maintain the switches and the network used to route long-distance calls.

"This is the one of the largest, if not the largest, dollar issues before the FCC," Wallman said.

Ceramics Professor Yoshiro Ikeda has been at K-State for 17 years. From Kagoshima, Japan, he teaches ceramics to graduate students and has been teaching for more than 20 years.

Family, work balance artist's life

CHRISTI WRIGHT
Collegian

Hidden away in a cluttered office in West Stadium works an internationally known artist.

Yoshiro Ikeda is a tenured professor, artist, honored faculty member, spokesperson for the arts, husband and father.

Ikeda said he is proud of his accomplishments but doesn't brag about his talent.

Ikeda was born in Kagoshima, Japan, and his family moved to the United States when he was 14 years old. He said his interest in art began when he was a child.

"I have always been interested in art since I was in the fourth grade," Ikeda said.

His talent in the arts led him to Portland State University, where he studied architecture. During his last year at the university, he started selling his work.

Ikeda described his artwork as non-functional.

"Non-functional pieces are things you don't use in the kitchen," he said.

"The prices when I started selling my work were around $50. Now things will sell for more than $1,000," he said.

One of his most expensive works, a decorative piece titled "Dream," was sold for $1,800.

Ikeda has been teaching at K-State since 1978, and he received tenure and was named head of the ceramics area in 1981.

In addition to teaching ceramics to graduate students, he sells his own work and travels to exhibits conducting workshops.

Even now that Ikeda has established a name for himself as an artist, he still does all of his work alone from start to finish.

"I do everything myself, and I don't have an assistant. Art is something you do yourself. You have to feel the materials," he said.

He has been teaching for more than 20 years. He taught Ceramics I to beginning students but has started teaching graduate students.

"I think it's easier teaching the older students because they are more confident about their work. You have to constantly motivate the younger students," he said.

Ikeda said he believes in the teaching technique of students playing a large part in their education process. He said 50 percent of the effort should come from the student, and 50 percent should be given by the instructor.

When Ikeda was in school, he set a goal to be one of the top 10 ceramic artists in the country.

"I haven't achieved my goal yet, but I'm still working," he said.

The ceramic exhibits have taken him all over the world, including California, Texas and Brazil. He also has numerous pieces at exhibits all over the country.

"It's an honor to see my pieces at museums and conferences," Ikeda said.

Ikeda said his teaching schedule and life as an artist work well together. He has two children. One is a junior at K-State, and another is a senior in high school.

"My family is very supportive of my work," he said.

Library construction on schedule; project still within budget

CHRISTI WRIGHT
Collegian

The construction of Farrell Library is on budget and on schedule.

The library was contracted to be a 30-month project, and the construction is still in that time frame. After almost one year of construction, the building is still on schedule, Karen Cole, associate dean of the library, said.

"The contractor thought the project could be completed in about 24-26 months, and the construction is behind his schedule. There was some weather delays, but the work is picking up again," she said.

Many students don't see the end result of the library and only focus on the inconvenience of the construction, Brice Hobrock, dean of Farrell Library, said.

"The reconstruction of the library is the largest construction that K-State has ever taken on. It's the biggest project in the entire regent's system," he said.

The construction includes building on the south, west and east sides and changing the outer appearance of the north side.

Library administrators also say the project is within its budget.

"The state allocated money for the project, and we can't go over that budget. It would be illegal," Hobrock said.

The library project will cost more than the University originally intended to spend, but K-State took the lowest bid for the project, which was $28 million.

The building itself will cost about $22 million, and the rest is going to fees for the architects, surveyors, landscaping and equipment, Cole said.

A contingency plan was made to provide flexibility with the equipment spending during the construction process. The equipment includes furnishings like tables, chairs, shelves, computers and wiring.

While the project is not over budget, it definitely is not going to go under budget.

"We definitely will spend all of the funds. The equipment budget was not generous, so that has been shifted a little. But we are still within the authorized budget," Hobrock said.

Seniors might remember back to 1991 when the first steps were taken to improve the library facilities.

Cole said students were complaining about the bad library situation and went to the state legislators and basically said they wanted a new library.

Since then, more than $5 million in student fees has gone to the library construction project.

"The students made this possible. Many people don't remember, but it was the students that made the difference," Cole said.

Students will see some changes before school is out. The footings and foundation will be put up on the south and west sides, Hobrock said.

The present front door will remain there for the next 12-14 months, and then it will be moved to the northwest corner when the west addition is done. The new door will be across from Lafene Health Center.

For the time being, the library facility isn't the most quiet and convenient place to study.

"There should be more than one entrance. They can't do anything about the noise, but they could stop the doors from slamming," Bob Prichard, junior in pre-veterinary medicine, said.

Another person was bothered by the lack of parking around the library.

"You have to park a half of a mile away and walk a half of a mile just to get here. Then it's incredibly noisy and hard to study," said Kurk Harris, a Fort Riley resident who takes night classes at the fort.

IN OUR OPINION

by the Collegian Editorial Board

An idea that will leave you spokeless

Charging a $5 bike registration fee is not conducive to establishing a bicycle-friendly campus.

Attention to all students: The University has decided to tax a group of people who use a non-polluting, non-fuel-consuming form of personal transportation that requires almost no parking space.

We're talking about bicycles.

At present, it costs students nothing to ride or park a bicycle on campus.

Registration is voluntary and free. Parking Services wants to change that.

After all the debate on the parking problem on campus, it is surprising that Parking Services would develop a suggestion that would provide an incentive not to use one's bicycle.

The reason for the registration, which would become mandatory in fall 1996, is to support the bicycle-friendly program. A $5 fee, to take effect in fall 1997, is supposed to pay for more bike paths and bike racks.

Unfortunately, such suggestions rarely work out as planned. Hidden expenses, such as enforcement of the policy, creep in. Bureaucracy and fees increase.

Bicycle use has increased in the past without fees.

It hardly makes sense to assume that it will continue to do so after fees and the bureaucratic hassle that goes with them have been put into place.

In short, if it isn't broken, don't fix it.

Shhhhh! Did you hear something?

When was the last time you remember hearing complete and total silence?

I'm talking about so quiet, all that can be heard is your own heartbeat and the ringing in your ears. Or the last time you heard water pounding on a beach without the sound of cars on the highway behind you? Or woke up in the night to hear the wind making the trees creak?

Don't panic; I don't remember either.

I've been noticing a lack of silence lately on campus, and especially in my living room. Every so often, I get this urge — call it a craving — to lock the world away and be alone. Just me, a book and maybe a hot cup of tea. When the weather's nice, I like a little fresh air.

Last week when it was so nice outside, I decided to sleep with my bedroom windows open. I enjoy the breeze, and the weather was warm enough that I wasn't worried about catching a cold.

I also like the way the air smells this time of year in the morning. So I checked my screens, hauled up my windows and settled in for a pleasant night's sleep.

The next morning I was yanked awake by the sound of rap music rattling my windows and making my eyes water. I finally figured out it was coming from a white Cadillac in the driveway across the street.

The car sat in the drive with the doors and trunk wide open, and the owner dancing around and waxing the car.

No matter where I went in my apartment this noise followed me. I know a lot of people like rap, but that's not what I'm criticizing. Any music is noise when it's not wanted.

So after listening to the same three songs over and over while I got dressed and ate, I went for a walk, the whole time feeling like I was being driven from my home.

I didn't used to care how loudly anyone played anything; music was music, and nothing really bothered me. I've damaged my ears since then and try to be careful how loudly I play my own stereo. I'll probably end up with hearing aids eventually, and I'm trying to delay the inevitable as long as possible. It never occurred to me that I would have to worry about how loud my neighbors across the street were.

Then I came to college and lived in the dorms for a year. After a couple perfectly audible conversations through cinder block walls, I came to appreciate quiet.

When I craved some peace, I could always go to the library, but lately the stacks sound like a dentist's drill the size of Pakistan is going to work.

KADY MASSEY

What happened to quiet? Where are the days when a moment of silence was observed before meals and people sat calmly and read books? I remember hearing that people who must have noise all the time are probably afraid of their own thoughts. I'm perfectly comfortable with my thoughts and would love to spend some quality time with them.

Why don't people consider that not everyone on their block likes Tupac Shakur? Actually, I have no idea who this particular artist was. All I know was that it was obscene and made my boyfriend blush. He used to be in the Navy, so this was pretty nasty stuff.

The campus noise I can deal with. Construction is always loud, and I can always walk away from it, but noise that invades my own home is something different.

I haven't been able to find a decent solution, except to buy ear plugs and white noise tapes. In the meantime, maybe this guy's speakers will melt, or all his tapes and compact discs will spontaneously combust. I have hope of hearing the wind blow through the fir trees again.

Kady Massey is a sophomore in journalism and mass communications.

Endorsements 'Я' not Us

It's that time of year again.

Student government candidates roll up their sleeves and prepare to campaign, while the rest of us roll up our pants legs and prepare to be knee-deep in politics.

N. STEWART ANDERSON

The deadline for filing for SGA elections was Tuesday. We will soon have all the candidates' names for Student Senate, college councils, Union Governing Board, etc. Almost all the presidential and vice presidential candidates have announced their bids.

Now the "fun" part starts — the campaigning.

People have been questioning me about whether the Collegian will be endorsing candidates for office. I've said it before, and I'll say it again.

The Collegian will not be endorsing any SGA candidates.

(One more time for good measure.)

The Collegian will not be endorsing any SGA candidates.

We are not endorsing candidates because it is possible Collegian staff members might be running for office.

If we endorsed candidates who are staff members, it would never be taken seriously that we had endorsed them based on their platforms and not because they were colleagues and friends.

We would spend more time defending our endorsements than actually covering the elections.

We're also not endorsing candidates because, in theory, whoever we picked would win because we would blitzkrieg the students with how great a president or vice president a person would be.

The issues and voters should decide who the next president and vice president will be, not the Collegian.

We can encourage discussion of issues. We might make suggestions about debate topics. We will publish a voters' guide. But we don't want to set a precedent that future editors and staffs might regret.

We have staff members running for SGA positions this semester. These staff members are not allowed to write columns during the elections. They will return after elections, regardless if they win or not.

In the recent weeks, the Collegian's integrity has been questioned. Some staff members' integrity and my own integrity have been scrutinized.

This column is not for the purpose of defending my or other staff members' personal honor.

This column is to define our election policies and to defend the newspaper's integrity and honor.

We take our jobs seriously and understand the responsibility that comes with freedom of the press. We treat this freedom with caution and respect.

Accusations, bordering on inquisitions, have been made about staff members possibly showing bias for or against candidates. If we thought someone was guilty of biased reporting, that person would not be covering that particular topic and may not even be working on the Collegian.

My staff and I have invested too much time, blood, sweat, tears, aspirin, antacid tablets, cigarettes and GPA points into the Collegian to sell out integrity or play favorites with the candidates.

Our integrity has never been and never will be on auction block to go to highest bidder.

Let's take a hypothetical situation. Let's spin an off-the-wall yarn. If a Collegian staff member did try to promote or derail a certain campaign, it would soon be caught and stopped by fellow staff members.

Our editing process doesn't stop with just one person. Stories are read by several copy editors and editors during the nightly production process. All parts of the paper are seen by several people.

We take our jobs very seriously, understanding the responsibility that comes with the freedom of the press. We treat this freedom with caution and respect.

Yes, we can make mistakes; we are only human. But I have the utmost confidence that my staff could and would find any blatant and/or deliberate attempts of slanted coverage.

So, sit right back and let us try to inform you of the debates, issues and day-to-day updates for the next four weeks of this year's elections.

If you have any questions about why we did or didn't cover something or about how we covered something, don't hesitate to call and ask us at 532-6556 or e-mail us at collegn@spub.ksu.edu.

Boys Scouts should stay the same

Dear editor,

"Boy Scouts Should Encompass All Beliefs". This was the title of Dan Lewerenz's article on March 16. Now who is he to criticize the oldest and largest world organization? Scouts has lasted 87 years. All the sudden, smart guy Dan says it should be another way. I'll bet all the national executives in Dallas can't wait to rewrite scouting's aims — wait, maybe not.

Dan says the Boy Scouts should let Brad Seabourn, an admitted atheist, go to Philmont Scout Ranch and they were wrong not to let him join the Scouts. First let me ask you this question, tough guy. What would you say if I tried to join the VFW or the Girl Scouts and since I'm not female or a veteran they both told me to get lost. The natural response is that it would be the group's jurisdiction since I don't meet their requirements for joining. Well, the Boy Scouts also have requirements. In fact, in the handbook, the new title of the first rank is joining requirements. You said you were in the Scouts, Dan. Did you not make it this far? Just the words "joining requirements" suggest that not everyone is eligible; for example, atheists.

You did make a good point, Dan, that scouting teaches life skills. But that's the potatoes, and you missed the meat, smart guy. Scouting's goal is to train boys to be leaders through the scout oath and law. Just think of what the eagle rank means — among other things, that you are a leader. The scout oath and law are the guidelines of scouting, the first part of the oath is duty to God and the twelfth point of the scout law is reverence. Now Dan, the question is where do your atheists fit in this environment?

I don't know what kind of scouting background Dan Lewerenz has, but I've been in Scouts since 1982, am an eagle scout and am currently assistant scoutmaster in two troops and would confidently say any day that atheists would be counterproductive to scouting and therefore are neither wanted nor welcome. Get a clue, Dan.

Apathy at the root of social ills

One of the requirements of being a columnist is caring about humanity.

Unfortunately, the more a person begins to care about humanity, the more that person gets put outside of the mainstream.

At first glance, the second statement seems as if it is impossible to be true. The more you learn, though, the more you might realize its truth.

Even though it is human nature to be self-interested, it is not human nature to be apathetic. Intense self-interest — not selfishness, not egotism — eventually leads outside the individual, bringing a person into greater connection between the world around. This is sometimes called awareness.

Awareness is frightening. Terrifying. Shocking. Disappointing. Revolting. At first.

Eventually, awareness leads to acceptance and understanding. By the time a person gets to a level of awareness that brings greater understanding, the person usually is disconnected from most people because it's hard for them to relate to this person. It's ironic, isn't it — the more you understand and care about people, the less they like you? Almost everything is ironic.

One of the issues people ponder is why there is so much violence in today's world. Violence is connected to apathy, the very kind of apathy on this campus and throughout the western world. The violence everyone is so concerned about is being committed by people who don't care about their futures nor anyone else's. Violence is amplified apathy.

How much do you care? If you're not apathetically violent, are you violently apathetic?

Apathy is the reason most Americans don't even know who the speaker of the House of Representatives is. Most don't know who their representative in Congress is. The fact that you read the opinion page of a newspaper puts you in the political awareness elite. Frankly, that doesn't necessarily say as much about your awareness as it does about most other people's.

SCOTT ALLEN MILLER

The phrase "who cares?" is now a widespread excuse not to care. After all, caring, thinking, learning and development are difficult. It's simply easier for most of us to be stupid and allow ourselves to be led.

Some of us begin to develop awareness about those we allow to lead us. That's why there is so much political activism going on these days. A few people are trying to bolster the ideologies they have bought into and the people who try to be spokespeople for those ideologies. Few ever develop their own ideologies but instead go along with someone else's.

Most people, though, only want what helps them avoid displeasure for a while. Most people never vote, never wonder why their gross pay is so much more than what they take home and never develop any sense of understanding of anything. They either wonder why they're unhappy or find something to divert their unhappiness.

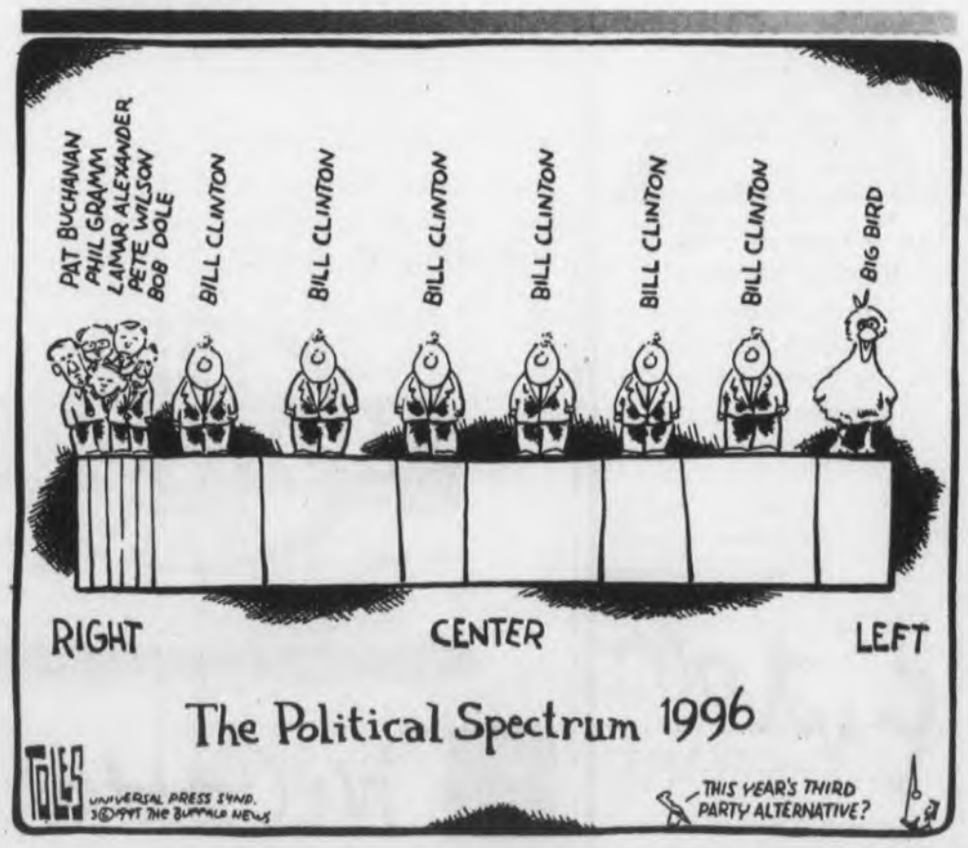
Most are apathetic.

No wonder. It doesn't pay to be aware. Anyone who develops awareness of any depth can be difficult for others to predict and prejudge.

When the apathetic majority can't pigeonhole a person, things get confusing. People are forced to think. This angers people.

Upsetting the applecart scatters apples of wisdom. It also upsets the people who try to keep the apples neat, unbruised and in the cart.

In other words, don't think too much if you want to have friends these days. This age in which striving to be average is the best way to make sure you don't make anyone else look bad. As we all know, it's not cool to be different. It's certainly not cool if you're different because you're intelligent.



This sounds crass, but it's not. It's not even cynical. It's not bitter. It is true, though.

Loving and learning to understand people through love is politically incorrect. Love is what Jesus taught. He also was publicly executed for it before he reached the age of 34.

Learn from his example. Don't think. Maybe you can be a Collegian columnist.

K-State fraternity and sorority housemoms provide a home-like environment for their

Surrogate children

As most students attend class, a group of housemothers gathers at Godfather's Pizza in Aggieville. They come to chat and drink coffee daily.

"There's a lot of camaraderie," Maryanne Shutler, Sigma Sigma Sigma housemother, said.

Theta Xi housemother Alta Dorlac said being a housemother is a rewarding job, and being with young people is one of the best things about it.

Beverly Hughes, Sigma Phi Epsilon housemother, agreed.

"It's a fun job, just being with them. They're fun," she said.

Bobbie Lonker, Beta Theta Pi housemother, said she liked having the motherhood role of the house and has had many students keep in touch after graduation.

> "I'm just there if they need me to be."

"I think it's wonderful when you've been there awhile, or even just a year, but yet you see all these people graduate and then the reward of them coming back to see you or visit with you or see how things are going at the house," Lonker said.

"They don't forget you. I had one boy who on his Christmas card wrote, 'No matter where you are or what you're doing, always remember there's a Beta thinking about you.' When you see that many boys and they pass through your house, it really is neat," Lonker said.

The housemothers confer with each other about many things. Almost all of them are connected with their houses' kitchens in some way and discuss different food menus and meal plans.

If a student in a fraternity or sorority is having a problem, it's never discussed among the housemothers.

"We don't tell any secrets," Shutler said. "If somebody's having a problem, you don't tell everyone about it."

Students come to the housemothers with problems, and that's another reason the housemothers feel needed.

"They run their house, and I'm there if they need advice for something — not to interfere, but just to be there," Lonker said.

With many students coming from out of town, Lonker said it's her duty to be what her title says she is — a mother.

"Maybe if somebody's sick or something, I'll fix chicken noodle soup. I fix Jell-O. I do all those things that a mom would do," Lonker said.

"I can press a shirt or sew on a button. I'm just there if they need me to be," she said.

She said the relationships formed with the actual mothers of the students is very strong.

"I've had several boys that have been hurt, and they've been in the hospital and their moms have had to come, and so I just open my door to them too, to come in and sit and visit. They have a hard time going through things like that," she said.

Lonker said she was proud of the relationships she had made not only with the mothers but with the men in the fraternity.

She said if anyone had any idea how sweet her boys were, they'd know the world was in good hands.

One of the best ways to enjoy the role of a housemother is by being able to relate to the students not only as a mother but as a friend, Shutler said.

"I think it's the relationship you have with the house and how long you've been there and how well they view how you interact with them," she said.

Beta Theta Pi housemother Bobbie Lonker listens to Jarrod Jones, freshman in pre-veterinary medicine, as he plays the piano in the living room of the fraternity.

HATCHELL is the man

The Big Twelve Conference has its first commissioner.

Southwestern Conference commissioner Steve Hatchell beat out Kansas athletic director Bob Frederick for the job of the new Big Twelve Conference commissioner Sunday.

A report by the Associated Press said the vote was 7-5 in favor of Hatchell.

The vote was taken twice to ensure accuracy.

University of Oklahoma president David Boren said it was Hatchell's experience as commissioner of the SWC and his strong marketing skills that enabled him to edge out Frederick.

K-State president Jon Wefald, who was the search committee chairman, said Hatchell's representation of the Big Twelve during negotiations for a five-year, $100-million football TV contract was a deciding factor.

"This loomed very large in his selection," Wefald said.

"He has demonstrated excellence over the last 30 years. He's had tremendous success. He's dedicated and aggressive. With him, we hope to become the premier conference in the country."

SPRING football in air

The Big Eight Conference will give it one last go-around next year.

Preparation for the football season has already begun as spring football drills have started for most Big Eight teams.

This includes K-State, which officially begins spring drills today.

K-State coach Bill Snyder said the spring drills will be helpful to help fill some holes left because of graduation.

"We will need to improve our effectiveness of our special teams," Snyder said, "and develop the performance at quarterback, running back, wide receiver and offensive tackle, as well as linebacker.

"That, along with the development of senior leadership, will be the focus of our spring."

Snyder also said the Big Eight race will be challenging this season, but he said Nebraska will hold an early edge.

JEREMY CRABTREE

BOND sparks golf team

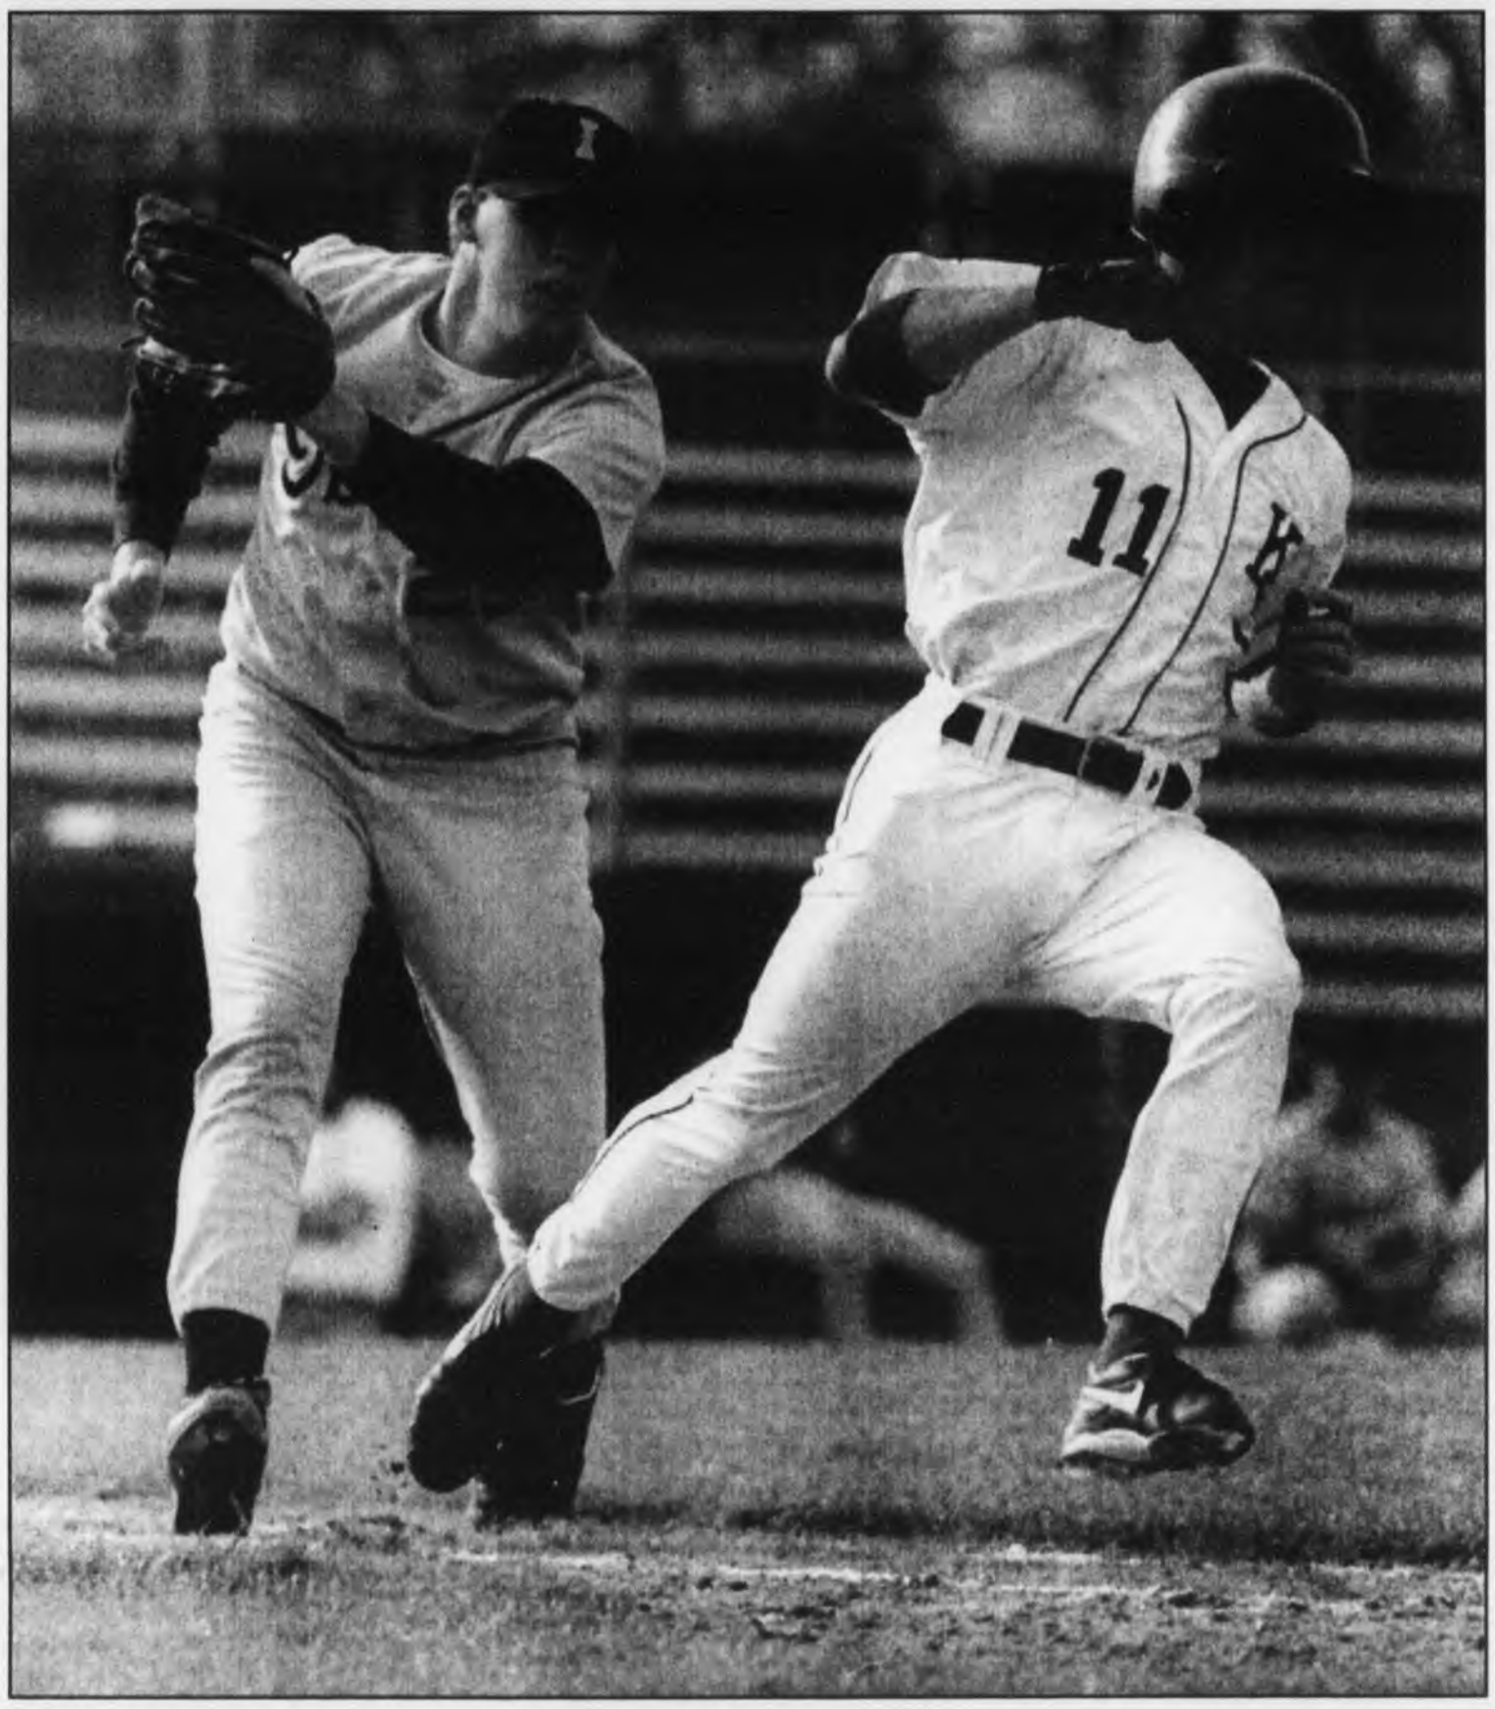
The women's golf team played in two tournaments during spring break.

The Wildcats started off the spring season with a sixth-place finish in the Lady Bronc Golf Classic.

Out of nine teams playing, the women finished the tournament with the second-best round of the day at 329.



Richelle Bond sparked the Wildcats' final-day rally with a score of 76 and a 27th-place finish.

The leading finisher on the team was Jacque Wright, who ended up with a three-round total of 248 for a share of fifth place.

The Wildcats then headed to College Station, Texas, for the Texas A&M Bookstore/Welsh Memorial Tournament.

The women placed 10th out of 17 teams.

Cats get back on winning track

PHILL SPIKER
Collegian

The K-State baseball team finished spring break the same way it started — with a win.

The Cats went 3-3 last week, including a dramatic win against Nebraska in the final game of the Cats' three-game series against the Huskers Sunday evening.

K-State took two of three from the Iowa Hawkeyes but could only manage one victory against Nebraska.

The Cats opened up the break March 17 by defeating Iowa 7-4.

The Hawkeyes never led and scored all four of their runs in the ninth, all of which were unearned.

The Cats were paced by Tim Decker, who went two for four with a double, a stolen base and two RBIs. Adam Green contributed to the Cats' win by going three for three with two runs scored and an RBI.

Iowa was led by left fielder Jeremy Lewis, whose only hit was a three-run home run in the top of the ninth.

Cats sophomore Eric Yanz recorded six strikeouts and raised his record to 3-1 on the year.

Iowa hurler Colin Mattiace received the loss, dropping his mark to 1-2.

In the second game on March 18, Iowa evened the series at 1-1 with a 6-2 victory against K-State.

K-State only managed five hits off Hawkeye starter Jeremy Meccage and didn't get a hit against Iowa relievers Robert Holst and Kurt Belger. Holst got the win, pitching three solid innings with three strikeouts.

K-State sophomore Jon Oiseth received the loss, dropping his record to 0-2 on the season.

The Cats bounced back March 19 to take two of three from the Hawkeyes with a 7-3 victory.

Todd Fereday paced the Cats, going two for five with an RBI. Brad Harker added two RBIs while going one for four from the plate. Iowa was led by designated hitter Steve Boros, who went two for three with a run scored and an RBI.

Junior Jack Witt (2-0) got K-State's second complete game of the series by pitching a seven-hitter and recording 10 strikeouts. Mike Parenteau got the loss, dropping his record to 0-1.

The Cats opened their three-game series with a 16-9 loss to the Cornhuskers. K-State went through six pitchers in the game, with none of them pitching more than two innings each.

"Once it got nine to nothing, we did a good job from that point on, but it was too late," K-State coach Mike Clark said.

"We can't keep beating ourselves with our pitching and our errors."

The Cats lost the first game of a doubleheader Sunday to Nebraska 16-11.

K-State was paced by sophomore Scott Poepard, who went four for five with three RBIs, two runs scored and a home run.

Nebraska was led by Alvie Shepherd, who went three for five, and Matt Meyer, who went two for three. Both Huskers had four RBIs each.

Larry Walty got the loss, dropping his record to 0-3, and Jonas Armenta got the win, raising his record to 4-0.

In the second game of the doubleheader, K-State led the game 4-3 going into the top of the seventh, until Darin Erstad hit a two-run homerun that gave the Huskers a 5-4 lead.

Nebraska kept its one-run lead until the Cats rallied in the bottom of the ninth to tie the game 5-5 and send the game into

Miller leaves for another job

JEREMY CRABTREE
Collegian

K-State lost a football coach last week.

That's when offensive coordinator Del Miller took over the top job at Southwest Missouri State. Miller said he had thought about coaching at Southwest Missouri State before actually taking the job.

Miller

"We drove up, and we took a look," Miller said. "I was very, very impressed with the Springfield area and the university.

"I said at the time that if I ever got the opportunity, I'd like to look into this position."

Under Miller, the K-State offense has grown to be one of the most powerful in the country.

Using a wide-open passing attack, K-State set a school record of 4,231 yards in 1991.

K-State had the top passing attack last season in the conference with a 237-yard per-game average.

With a wide-open attack, receivers have flourished under Miller.

In 1991, Miller coached all-American Michael Smith to become the second all-time leading receiver in Big Eight history.

Miller said he is planning on taking the same passing attack to Southwest Missouri.

"We're very much like an NFL-style offense," Miller said. "We try to be balanced; we try to be unpredictable. We will try to throw the football a little more perhaps."

Last season, the Bears went 4-7, which was the team's first losing season since 1987.

"This has been a top-notch program to start with," Miller said. "We want to take that as a base and move upward from there."

Before taking the assistant job at K-State, Miller was an assistant coach at Iowa for 11 years.

Along with Snyder and Coach Hayden Fry, Miller helped turn the Hawkeyes into winners. Miller said he's going to take both Snyder's and Fry's influence with him to Southwest Missouri.

"Both of those people are outstanding leaders," he said. "Anytime you talk about leadership roles, you try to emulate the people around you who have been successful."

Cats capture 2 titles over spring break road trip

WESS HUDELSON

The women's track team captured two team titles during spring break.

On March 18 it captured the team championship at the College Station Relays at Texas A&M.

On Saturday the women swept all 11 running events, set three records and won the dual competition with Southwest Texas University at San Marcos, Texas.

The men finished seventh at the College Station Relays with 32 points and outscored Southwest Texas 105-1/2 to 67-1/2.

"I thought we competed well, but we can do a lot better," Coach Cliff Rovelto said.

Nicole Green won the 400 meters at Texas A&M with a time of 52.60. The time surpassed the NCAA automatic qualifying standard.

Fighting through heavy winds, Green also won the event at Southwest Texas with a time of 56.29.

Karissa Owens won the 100-meter dash with a time of 11.73 at College Station. Owens captured the event at Southwest Texas with a wind-aided time of 11.45.

"Karissa had some good races at both meets," Rovelto said. "Both of those times were significant PRs."

After finishing with a losing record, the Cats traveled a BUMPY ROAD

JEREMY CRABTREE
Collegian

Despite finishing with a losing record and getting blown out in the Big Eight Tournament, there are a few rays of hope on the K-State basketball horizon.

That ray of hope is that K-State coach Tom Asbury won't stand to be a loser.

"There is a huge discrepancy between the two programs," Asbury said.

"We've just got to challenge our underclassmen to go out and start assuming responsibility so we can start to narrow this gap.

"Certainly, as coaches, we need to go out and recruit better players to help narrow this gap in a hurry. We will do that, because I'm not sitting through this too much longer."

However, the Cats will have to go further than that to be successful in the Big Eight. The road to a winning record and postseason play goes through picking up blue-chip recruits.

And the Cats are already doing that.

With the signing of one of the state's best high-school players and a strong community-college transfer coming in, K-State has the prospects of a strong class.

"I think that we are two players away from being able to compete in the Big Eight," Asbury said.

"We have to go out and get them."

The Cats also return a strong nucleus from this season's squad.

This includes point guard Elliot Hatcher and streaking shooter Mark Young.

That, combined with redshirt Paco May and a good recruiting class, could bring some hope back to Manhattan.

Even with the losing record, this season was far from dull for K-State fans.

This is because Asbury entertained fans with one-liners that might even make David Letterman jealous.

"We couldn't throw it in the ocean," Asbury said after one of the Cats' miserable shooting performances this season.

Then there was Asbury's one-liner after losing 87-79 to Iowa State in Ames.

"Yeah, we lost," Asbury said when a TV reporter asked him for a quick, general comment about the game.

But some of Asbury's comments got him more attention then he wanted.

Take, for example, his comments toward former University of Oklahoma coach Billy Tubbs at a January press conference.

"I don't want to put a knock on Tubbs, except he's a jerk and an idiot, a negative recruiter and a real turd," Asbury said. "Other than that, he's not a bad guy.

"Probably way overrated as a coach," he said. "Other than that, he's just a terrific human being. You won't hear me say that about another coach, ever, before or ever after. Write that down."

Asbury later apologized for his comments.

But the damage was done — Asbury had become the most quotable coach in the Big Eight.

"I don't want to put a knock on Tubbs, except he's a jerk and an idiot, a negative recruiter and a real turd."
TOM ASBURY
K-State basketball coach

After the Tubbs incident, there was a situation where some media outlets reported that Asbury said Iowa State University star Fred Hoiberg isn't as good as some Division II players.

This all proved to be a mistake, as what Asbury really said got distorted.

"All I said is that if he couldn't shoot the ball, he wouldn't be a great Division I player," Asbury said.

"I really think that he is a great player, though."

All in all, the Cats' season had a few bright points. The Cats upset No. 25-ranked Oklahoma at home.

And the biggest victory of the season came when the Cats whipped Final Four-bound Oklahoma State on Jan. 7.

Asbury knows that it's going to take time.

As he said, it often takes three years to turn a program around.

Well, the Cats now have one year behind them.

Now at least there is some light at the end of the tunnel for K-State fans. Hopefully for them, that translates into a winning season extra frames.

Nebraska opened the 10th with a single by Erstad and a Mel Motley walk. Both runners advanced on a passed ball by K-State catcher Chris Bouchard. Then Husker first baseman Todd Sears received an intentional walk to load the bases for Husker catcher David Crain, who hit into a RBI force out that gave Nebraska a 6-5 lead. Motley scored on a wild pitch, which extended the Huskers' advantage to 7-5.

But the Cats weren't through yet.

In the bottom of the 10th, Bouchard reached first on a Nebraska error and then advanced to second on a Matt Miller single to set the stage for K-State junior David Hendrix.

Hendrix delivered, crushing a three-run blast into the pine trees in right center to give K-State an 8-7 victory.

"I knew the guy was going to be throwing fastballs. So, I went up looking for a fastball."
DAVID HENDRIX
K-State baseball player

"I knew the guy was going to be throwing fastballs. So, I went up looking for a fastball," David Hendrix said. "I just went up and tried to hit the ball hard, and things worked out."

K-State was led by Miller, who went three for five with two RBIs. Fereday also went two for three with a run scored.

Nebraska was led by Erstad, who went four for five with four RBIs, two runs scored and a home-run. Jon Albrecht (1-0) got his first win of the year.

K-State track shines in meets over break

Kristen and Kirsten Schultz picked up where they left off last season in the javelin.

Kristen finished second in the javelin with a toss of 163'1". Kirsten finished third with a distance of 159'.

Both distances provisionally qualify them for the NCAA Championships.

Senior Gwen Wentland finished third in the elite division of the heptathlon with 5,063 points.

Wentland cleared 6'4" in the high jump while competing in the heptathlon.

That height ties the American record owned by Jackie Joyner-Kersee.

"This was a meet we really wanted to do some things in," Rovelto said.

"The women's team looks strong in all areas. We don't really have a weak spot."

The men's team is still battling injuries. Several athletes did not make the trip.

"We still don't have everybody on the table yet," Rovelto said. "The kids that were there did a good job.

"We just need to get some people healthy, and we'll be fine."

Itai Margalit and Ed Broxterman placed second and third respectively in the high jump at the College Station Relays.

Both cleared 7'3/4".

Matt Jeffrey took third in the intermediate division of the decathlon with a total of 6,591.

At Southwest Texas, Senior Bill Fields walked away with two first-place finishes in the 100 meters and 200 meters.

K-State's next action is the KSU Open Saturday at R.V. Christian Track.

It is the Wildcats' only home meet of the season.

Events are tentatively set to start at around 1:30 p.m. with the field events first.

Then, at around 1:45 p.m., the running events are scheduled to start.

With the meet being an open, most teams won't field full squads.

Join the lively, bawdy pilgrims on the local vicarage lawn for the finals of the annual Geoffrey Chaucer Storytelling Competition. Tales are told of love, lust and laughter. Some are traditional and visual; others are, in the funniest and most good humored way, a little less delicate. The New Vic's raunchy and rambunctious rendering is not perhaps one for purists, but is definitely one that would have Chaucer rolling in the aisles.

Big Eight play brings renewed spirit to Cats

BRIAN THOMAS
Collegian

In many sports, conference play is the start of a brand new season.

For the K-State tennis team, Big Eight Conference play could not have come at a better time after the team struggled through a 6-6 non-conference season.

The Wildcats open conference action today as they travel to Columbia, Mo., to face the Missouri Tigers.

Coach Steve Bietau said the Tigers are not one of the stronger teams on the Wildcat schedule.

"Missouri has had a weak team for some time," Bietau said.

"That is not a knock on the players or coaches in particular.

"Their university just has not supported them as much as they should."

The Cats finished the non-conference season during spring break. K-State lost two of three matches on a road trip in New Orleans.

On Mar. 18, the Wildcats dropped a tough match to Tulane 5-4.

In singles play, K-State all-American Karina Kuregian, ranked No. 26 in the nation, claimed a 3-6, 6-3, 6-1 victory against Stephanie Michael.

Karen Nicholson posted a No. 3 singles win against Danielle Dilloff 6-3, 7-5.

The Wildcats also tallied a pair of victories in the doubles division.

The Cats open conference play today as they travel to Columbia, Mo., to face Mizzou.

Rice was K-State's next opponent in The Big Easy. The Owls proved to be too much, rolling past the Cats 7-2.

The only wins on the day came in No. 1 singles and doubles. Kuregian posted a 6-4, 6-2 victory against Paula Myslivecek.

The team of Kuregian and Martine Shrubsole took its first match after gaining the No. 14 ranking in the country with an 8-2 win against the duo of Amber Basica and Vessie Ivanova.

K-State's non-conference season came to a close with an easy 8-1 defeat of Cornell.

Kuregian completed a sweep on the New Orleans trip, capturing a 6-3, 6-0 win against Olga Itskhoki. Kuregian paired up with Shrubsole for an 8-3 victory against the team of Itskhoki and Mo Bertsch.

"They finished the trip in a positive way," Bietau said.

"They played some good tennis against Cornell.

"That match was one of the team's best of the year."

Bietau said his team is looking forward to the conference season.

"There are some teams hoping to get into the NCAA tournament," Bietau said.

"There are only 20 teams that go. For those teams, they may not look at the conference as a new season. For us, the Big Eight kind of gives us a clean slate."

Huskers have two capable returning quarterbacks

ASSOCIATED PRESS

LINCOLN, Neb. — The question buzzing around the opening of spring practice at Nebraska is who will win the quarterback job.

After all, Nebraska's 1995 football season opener at Michigan State on Sept. 9 is 167 days away.

Tommie Frazier, the No. 1 man to open the last two seasons, returns. So does Brook Berringer, who stepped in to win his seven starts while Frazier recovered from a problem with blood clots last fall.

"It's the first day of spring practice, I'm not going to try and be Superman," Frazier said Monday.

The senior-to-be admitted he was a little sore for the first day of practice but said it had nothing to do with football.

On Saturday, the engineer of NU's fourth-quarter comeback against Miami in the Jan. 1 Orange Bowl was in a traffic accident as he was on his way to the Tampa, Fla., airport to catch a flight back to Lincoln.

Frazier was taken to a local hospital for examination and then released. Frazier didn't want to talk about the incident.

His focus is on the 1995 season, when Nebraska will try to become the first team to win back-to-back national championships since Alabama did it in 1978 and '79.

"You're always trying to get better," he said. "I feel like I can improve all facets of my game."

Frazier and Berringer, who also will be a senior, are competing for the starting spot.

Coach Tom Osborne has said he probably won't make a decision on who gets the nod until a week before the season opener.

Frazier looked comfortable running plays in shoulder pads, helmet and shorts.

Nebraska must replace four of the offensive line starters from its national championship team.

Osborne sounded pleased with his team's first of 15 days of spring practice.

"I think attitude is always critical," Osborne said. "Every team has got a little different chemistry and a little different leadership.

"We're anxious to see how they respond, and we're hopeful they maintain their edge."

Cats survive Rangers, beat Bluejays

NICOLE POELL
Collegian

Although his Wildcat baseball team won both contests in Tuesday's doubleheader, Coach Mike Clark said he enjoyed the second outing much more.

"The second game was excellent," Clark said. "The first game, we survived."

Survive they did; the Cats had to overcome a stubborn Regis team to pull off the 11-8 victory.

K-State fell behind early, as the Rangers led throughout the first five innings. But a four-run sixth inning put Clark's Cats back on track for good.

Leading off the sixth, the Cats' Mike Gardner reached first after getting hit by a pitch and then advanced to second on a passed ball. Regis' pitching woes continued as Tim Decker walked and then reached second on a balk. Two more consecutive walks to Chris Hess and Todd Fereday sent one runner home to pull K-State to within one.

The Rangers finally recorded a couple of outs after Brad Harker struck out looking and Scott Poepard grounded out to first. But that fielder's choice allowed Decker to score from third, tying the game at seven apiece.

The Cats capitalized on an error by the Rangers' third baseman as both Fereday and Hess crossed the plate for two unearned runs to put K-State up, 9-7.

K-State added a couple of insurance runs in the seventh. Decker hit an inside-the-park home run with no men on to make the score 10-7. Hess followed with a single and a stolen base and then scored the Cats' final run from third after a wild pitch.

Regis would score just once more in the eighth inning as the Cats recorded their 10th win of the season. Junior pitcher Jake Voos picked up his first career win as a K-Stater, going 2.1 innings and giving up one hit, one run, one strikeout and seven walks. Dan Albrecht finished the second two innings to tally the save.

Things got better for Clark and his team in the second contest of the night against the Creighton Bluejays.

Once again, the Cats were sluggish in the early innings;. the Bluejays held a 3-1 lead through the fifth.

That's when K-State experienced a little déjà vu as they again scored four runs in the sixth inning. Chris Bouchard started it off with a walk and then reached second when Adam Green took a base on balls. Heath Schesser then came through with a clutch single to right.

Decker followed with another single to right, and with Hess at the plate, Creighton's pitcher didn't help his cause after getting called for a balk. After the smoke cleared, the Cats were ahead 5-3.

The Bluejays kept things interesting, though, as they scored one more run in the seventh and threatened to tie the game.

But K-State starter Matt Koeman kept his poise through the eighth inning, retiring three in a row before reliever Larry Walty came on in the ninth to put the game away as the Cats secured the 5-4 win.

Civilians, soldiers donate marrow

MARK GOODWIN
Collegian

A chance to save someone's life brought out hundreds of volunteers to the Fort Riley bone-marrow donor drive Tuesday.

The drive, open to military and civilian personnel at Fort Riley, is designed to increase the number of potential bone-marrow donors on the national registry.

Volunteers had blood samples taken, which will be shipped to a naval lab in Bethesda, Md. More than 150 volunteers were screened in the first hour of the drive Tuesday morning.

The Fort Riley donation drive was organized in conjunction with a defense department donor center in Bethesda. However, civilians as well as military personnel are eligible to receive transplants if the national registry database reveals a compatible donor.

Randy Morgan, recruitment specialist for the donor center, said getting more potential donors signed up is very important.

"When more folks join the national registry, there is a direct relationship with our ability to find more matches," Morgan said.

"It's a matter of fate once they're on the registry, because it is quite difficult to find a match."

Morgan said more than 3,000 matches that led to transplants have been discovered since the program was started in 1987.

While 3,000 may seem like a large number of transplants, Morgan said 16,000 people are diagnosed with 60 fatal blood diseases requiring a bone marrow transplant each year.

Despite the long odds against a match between donor and recipient marrow, one woman who participated in the marrow drive two years ago was selected recently to donate her marrow.

Jean Peterson, a civilian employee at Fort Riley, was screened in 1993 and placed on the national registry. She was contacted in September and told that she was a preliminary match for a 24-year-old man who had chronic myelinogous leukemia.

"They asked me if I'd like to continue because they were looking at other potential donors, and I said yes. I definitely wanted to continue," Peterson said.

"They called me Dec. 29 and notified me that I was a match for this young man, and the only thing that will save his life is a bone-marrow transplant."

"The transplant took place Feb. 24, and this week I should be hearing about his condition. I'm really hoping to hear something good," Peterson said.

Peterson said the procedure was not as painful as some people think. She was given a local anesthetic and didn't even have to miss lunch.

"The discomfort that I went through is nothing compared to what the individual who received the transplant has already gone through," Peterson said.

Peterson also said she was impressed by the follow-up from the people at the national marrow donor center.

"They call you, they ask you how you're feeling, they're concerned about you. It was just great."

Anyone interested in donating can call 1-(800) MARROW-2.

Book rebinding, labor part of repair bill

The damaged books were taken to Mason's office, where the books were opened with their pages fanned out and air-dried by two fans.

"Nothing was soaked completely," Mason said.

Some of the books had to be rebound because the covers were distorted, but none of the books was completely destroyed, he said.

The books affected by the water were in the areas of educational and juvenile literature.

"The wettest books were in front of the fan for nine days," Mason said.

Rebinding the books will cost about $100, he said.

There will also be additional expenses for increased staff time needed to clean the water-affected area. The total cost to repair the damages is unknown, Mason said.

The damage occurred when water leaked through the roof onto the vacant fifth floor of the building. From the fifth floor, the water flowed into the occupied fourth floor, he said.

The dirty water originally came into the fifth floor through holes in the ceiling where pipes used to be.

"We moved 66 shelves to get them out of the way of the water," Mason said.

In addition to the shelves being moved, plastic was hung to protect the books from any further damage.

The roof of Farrell has been repaired by University facilities since the water damage occurred.

"Problems are always heightened during construction. With so many changes going on, the chance of fire or water damage increases," he said.

Lynn Cowley, building project manager, said after the building renovation is completed, a new roof will be put on the entire building.

Senator proposes cap on direct loan program for the following year.

"These cuts will probably take effect in 1996-97," Moeder said. "But there has been talk of cutting the tentative allocation for 1995-96."

Financial aid directors from across the nation have banded together in a group called the Alliance to Save Student Aid, Moeder said.

"It has been proven, since the time of the GI Bill, that funding of student education helps the national economy," Moeder said. "Student financial aid is now only 1 percent of the total federal budget."

Congress needs feedback from students and parents so they will know how students feel when they begin to cut the budget, Moeder said.

Several other changes in student aid are also being proposed by local representatives to congress.

Brownback has proposed dismantling the Department of Education.

Much of the responsibility of the federal department would be returned to the states, McClaskey said. Control of the federal student-aid program would be turned over to the Department of Treasury under Brownback's proposal.

"He believes that government should only be involved in essential functions," McClaskey said.

Sen. Nancy Kassebaum, R-Kan., has introduced a bill that caps participation in the Direct Student Loan program, Moeder said. Direct student lending allows students to borrow money from the federal government instead of private banks, Moeder said.

Kassebaum is opposed to direct lending because of the increased bureaucracy she has said it would cause. Students would be able to repay loans based on their level of income, which might mean paying more money in the long run.

"She is concerned because students may not be aware of how much more interest they will be paying," Moeder said.

However, direct student lending has proven successful in the 105 schools using it so far, Moeder said. K-State freshmen and sophomores will borrow under the Direct Student Loan program beginning next year.

"The schools participating in this program so far have reported nothing but favorable results," Moeder said. "Students have been able to get their money faster and more simply than ever."

Reader longs for springtime romance

Dear Cassandra,

Springtime is probably one of the greatest times of the year. The sun is shining, everything seems to be reborn, and everyone is in love. That is, except for me.

You see, I was in love once. It was great. But the time has come and gone, and I feel like I am ready to again. So I guess my question to you then, Cassandra, is what does it take for a nice, sincere and caring male to meet an equally sincere, loving female on campus?

Signed, No Name

Dear No Name,

You're asking me a question that has been around since God was a child. I have no idea what it takes to attract and keep a mate. If I did, I would bottle it and make a million dollars. Stay sincere and nice, and it'll happen when you least expect it.

Reviewer not shocked with Gump's success

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Collegian

Life is like a box of chocolates for Tom Hanks.

At Monday night's Academy Awards, Hanks walked away with his second Best Actor Oscar in a row for his portrayal of a dim-witted all-American in "Forrest Gump." He won last year for "Philadelphia."

The Gump-a-mania continued with the picture winning Best Picture and Robert Zemeckis winning for Best Director. Neither award was much of a surprise.

Did Hollywood sell out to commercialism and box-office bucks? You could say giving Hanks the Oscar was too easy.

The Academy had the chance to honor someone with remarkable talent who doesn't need an accent or an offbeat quirk to boost his or her performance, like Morgan Freeman's intense performance in "The Shawshank Redemption" or Nigel Hawthorne's tour de force in "The Madness of King George."

The Best Picture Oscar was pretty predictable but not necessarily deserved. This critic, and many others, prefers "Pulp Fiction," the only movie to really say something fresh and innovative in 1994. "Gump," at times, is as superficial as "The Lion King."

Zemeckis' Oscar really threw me off. Quentin Tarantino's direction of "Pulp Fiction" was incredible. Had he thrown in some shots of John Travolta shaking hands with John F. Kennedy, maybe he would have won.

Perhaps the most interesting category to watch was Best Actress. Many critics expected Jodie Foster to win for her wild-child performance in "Nell."

But, in the end, Jessica Lange's performance in the little-seen-outside-of-Hollywood movie "Blue Sky" garnered her second Oscar and first for Best Actress. Lange won Best Supporting Actress for "Tootsie."

I'd expect to see Lange in a slew of new movies because this Oscar will breathe new life into her slumping career.

The two most predictable categories were for the supporting performances. Best Supporting Actor deservedly went to Martin Landau for his dead-on take of Bela Lugosi in "Ed Wood." Dianne Wiest won for supporting actress for "Bullets Over Broadway."

Elton John picked up his first Oscar for Best Song for "Can You Feel the Love Tonight" from "The Lion King." Surprise!

Tarantino didn't leave empty-handed, walking away with an Oscar for Best Screenplay written especially for the screen for "Fiction." It's a start on what will surely be a lengthy and rewarding Hollywood career.

David Letterman was absolutely hilarious as host of the Oscars for the first time. He took pot-shots at everyone from Oprah to Uma Thurman, leaving no Hollywood-type out of the line of fire.

His bits with the running-in-circles dog, a funny Top Ten List and his outtakes from his horrid movie "Cabin Boy" were Letterman mastery at its best.

Art spurs controversy with feminist tones

PAGE GETZ
Collegian

Girlie, gold digger, legs, chick, Amazon, sister, bitch.

If you are one, if you know one, if you've ever heard of this creature woman, you have a good reason to drop into the K-State Union Art gallery this week to explore Kim Logan's MFA thesis exhibition of the sarcastic but light depiction of 1950s domestic goddesses.

If ad executives in the 1950s had dropped acid, the result might have been an ad campaign resembling the work of Kim Logan, a graphic designer for University Publications for three years.

Although the exhibit approaches the sensitive gender role tug-of-war with humor, more than a few eyebrows have been raised over the brash and unapologetic nature of her work.

But Logan's interest is not in the response.

"It's really a show for me," she said. "I didn't do it for a reaction. I just want to point out where society has brought in a certain image of women, and everyone's bought it."

Logan has been focusing on women's issues in art since she began her master's work.

Her interest in women's issues is more personal than political.

"Part of it is just that I'm a woman, and I see certain inequalities in society where women are held to different standards, and I'm trying to point out how society hasn't changed some attitudes."

In a book left open for comments, the responses varied in extremes from thought-provoking, captivating, and perky to trash, tacky and "What the hell is this?"

Independent of any button-pushing that the exhibit seems to do, there is just a fine line between entertaining art and exhibitionism that irritates the delicate defensiveness of those who believe feminism is strictly for the premenstrual.

The exhibit uses dye-sublimation to portray the contrast in the roles of women then and now.

Logan's work has a powerful but charming feminism that makes no excuses.

"I think many women really relate to it and see where things really haven't changed," Logan said. "I hope that people aren't put off by some of the verbiage, but the words are a linguistic reflection of our cultural perspective on women."

"It's not the work that is insulting. It is the reality they represent that is insulting," she said.

Most effectively, Logan's art shines a flashlight of social consciousness into the cob-webbed shadows of the sexual inequality that is still thriving to some extent today.

"I think it accurately depicted the image of women at the time," Theresa Gillenwater, senior in civil engineering, said. "It's still present today but much more subtly. It was probably shocking, but it opened people's eyes to how women are still subtly degraded by society."

Logan said that is her goal as a designer.

"As designers, we have a responsibility to those who view it because it can change people's attitudes," she said. "What people see can change and manipulate the world. We have to be aware of that as designers."

I would agree with a comment left by Andrea Blair, campus learning disabilities specialist, when she said it made her soul yell.

ART EXHIBIT

Kim Logan's MFA thesis exhibition will show at the Union Art Gallery until Friday. The gallery is open from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. Monday - Friday.

Defeat likely for term limits

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — A constitutional amendment slapping term limits on lawmakers faced likely rejection Wednesday in the House, looming as a rare defeat for the Republican Contract With America.

Speaker Newt Gingrich sought to pin blame in advance on Democrats, who lined up to vote overwhelmingly against the politically popular measure.

"Give us 60 more Republicans next year, and we'll pass term limits," he said.

Yet after closing ranks with remarkable discipline on earlier items in their campaign manifesto, House Republicans faced numerous defections on term limits.

"I just can't be an accessory to the dumbing-down of democracy," said Rep. Henry Hyde, the 11-term Illinois Republican who helped steer other Contract With America items to passage as Judiciary Committee chairman.

"If this were a trial, I'd call as my first witnesses the Founding Fathers, who directly and unanimously rejected term limits."

Perhaps redundantly for a party that just lost its majority at the polls last fall, many Democrats said the amendment was unnecessary. "We've already got term limits," said Rep.

Pair enters race, looks for quality

SARAH LUNDAY
Collegian

Quality is in the eyes of the students.

At least that is what Jeremy Blair, junior in marketing, and Doug Bassett, junior in public relations, said as they announced their candidacy for student body president and vice president Wednesday night.

"With my plan, everything starts at the student level," Blair said.

"Ask the students what quality is. They know," he said.

Bassett said he and Blair are focusing on service because it is something that is currently underdeveloped.

"This past school year, student government in the eyes of the student was anything but quality," Blair said.

Student government does not have a whole lot of power, and the reason is because it does not have a strong leader who demands to be heard, he said.

"Somebody has to put the service back into student services," Blair said.

Blair said he was a Student Senate intern and knows how it worked when he was there and how it should work.

"SGA should, in a sense, cater to the students," Blair said.

Blair said student government should collect information from students through the use of exit surveys. He said once students have consumed a product, they should be asked how they like it.

In fact, the Office of Student Activities and Services should change its name simply to Student Services, he said.

Bassett said another reason student government should focus on serving the students is because students cannot make University administration do things without student government influence.

Parking services is not currently serving the students by increasing meter costs, he said.

And, he said, he promotes bicycles riding on campus, but not registration fees.

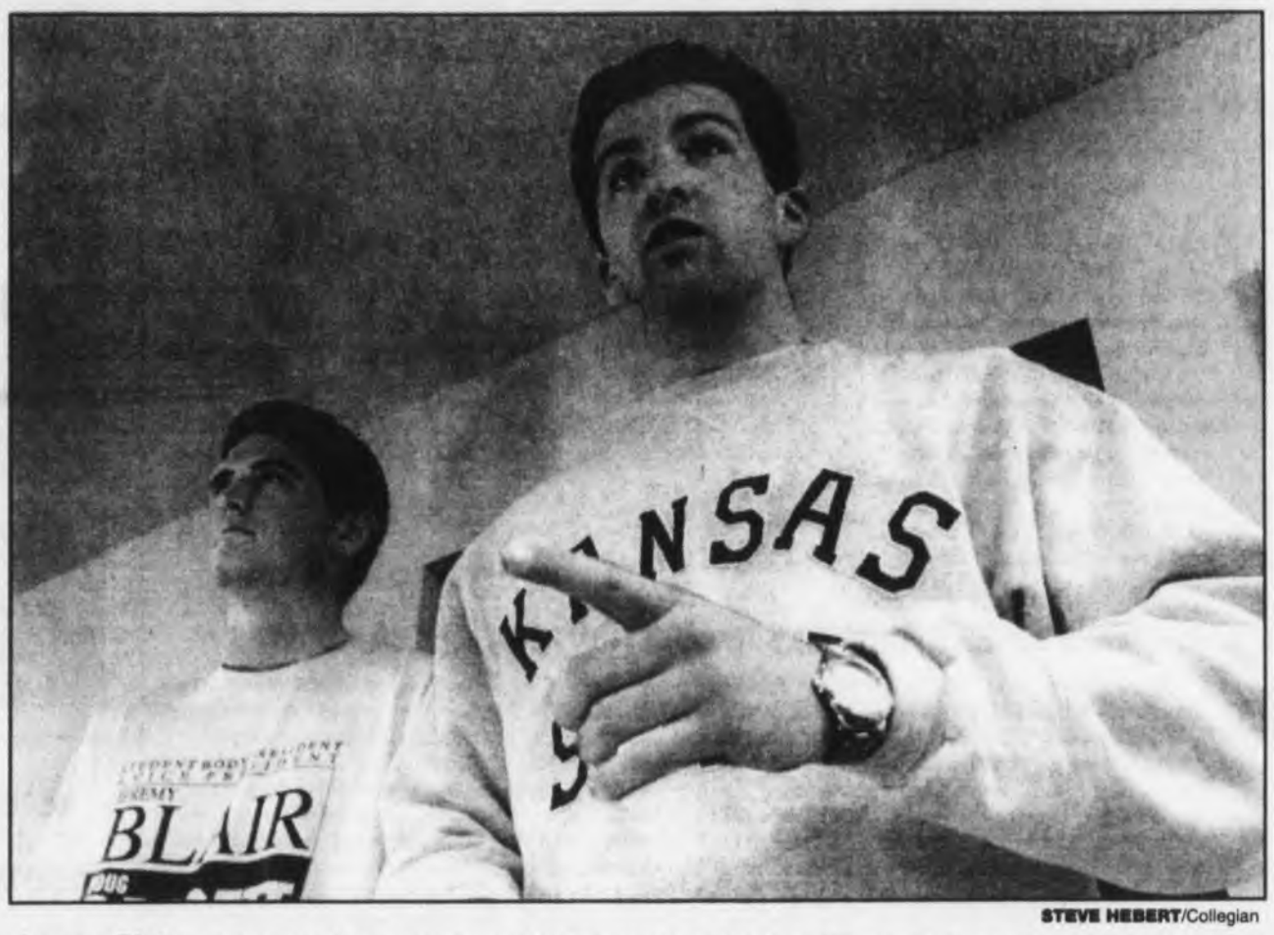
"Read my lips — no bicycle registration fees," Blair said.

"I hope parking services heard that."

Another area on which Blair said he hopes administrators will listen to him and the students is K-State Union expansion.

"Any aspect of Union expansion that is feasible and the students want it should be provided," he said.

To serve the students, the Union must know exactly what the students want, Blair said.



"We can't let administration do it all by themselves," he said.

Finally, Blair said he wants to decrease student fees and shift some funds to the Union Program Council so it has the power to demand great student service within the Union.

"This just takes hard work," he said.

Blair said he and Bassett were ready to work hard to make sure students received the services they wanted.

"And we are ready to rock 'n' roll tomorrow if we have to," Blair said.

▶ SPRING BREAK

Students experience spring break in unusual way

JANET GILLILAND

Instead of going skiing or relaxing on the beach for spring break, some K-State students donated their time participating in Spring Break Alternatives.

"It is a week-long immersion into a culture that is totally different than what they are use to," said Clint Leonard, junior in biochemistry and pre-medicine and coordinator of the event.

Students who participate in the program go in groups of eight to 10 and travel to a host site in a socio-economically poor area.

"We serve the people at the sites materially, but it is also great for them to see young people coming to help," he said.

Leonard said this was the second year for the program at K-State. Last year, there were two sites and 16 people. This year, there were four sites that consisted of 34 people.

Megan Curran, sophomore in pre-nursing, went to Chicago with Spring Break Alternatives.

Curran said she worked in a soup kitchen for homeless men and women and at another area that was for families, where she worked with the children.

"I had never experienced working with homeless people before, and I realized that there are a lot of things I do not need and that I take for granted," she said.

Chris Hansen, sophomore in nuclear engineering, went with another group to a center in Mexico where they visited neighboring villages and delivered toys and clothes.

"By working in the villages in Mexico, I learned to put my own life into perspective, and I learned a lot about myself. I saw how lucky we are living here because we have choices," Hansen said.

Lisa Pierce, junior in pre-occupational therapy, went to the third site, which was in the Appalachian Mountains in Kentucky.

"I helped with home-improvement projects in Kentucky. It was a good feeling I got knowing that I was helping out people, and I gave myself for another human being," she said.

Leonard said anyone at K-State can participate in this program. People are selected on a first-come, first-serve basis.

"All of the spots for this year were filled up one month ago. I can see us adding another site or two next year. The number limit is based upon the number of sites," he said.

"People can start signing up at the beginning of January. You can sign up at the St. Isidore's Catholic Center, but you do not have to be Catholic to participate."

Like other spring break trips, students have to pay their own way.

"The students pay their own way, but we did get an allocation from SGA that helped out. The cost is very small compared to other spring breaks that students go on," Leonard said.

Housing for the volunteers varies. Some places have beds, while other places just have a floor to sleep on.

Leonard said the Spring Break Alternative program is not a national organization. It is a campus-to-campus activity.

Students get a chance to experience a different culture than what they are used to.

Leonard said most students have not been to inner-city Chicago, the Appalachian Mountains or villages in Mexico, but it raises their cultural awareness and makes them more aware of social-justice issues.

Along with the people at the sites getting benefits, the student volunteers also benefit from the people there.

"At the site places we visited, the permanent staff volunteers working there are very aware and educated of what is going on, and they educate the students throughout the week," Leonard said.

"We hope that when the students come back to K-State, those small communities continue to grow and spread, and that the students bring more unity back here to K-State," he said.

Union creates new director position

LISA ELLIOTT
Collegian

K-State is looking for a new director for its Union to meet the challenges of commercializing it.

Union Director Jack Sills will resign from the job but will continue to serve as director until a new director is named later this year.

Sills will remain at K-State following the change and will serve in the new senior associate director position at the Union, said Pat Bosco, associate vice president for institutional advancement.

"Adding a senior associate director is nothing unusual," he said.

Bosco said additional people were hired when expansion began at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex as well.

K-State is gearing up for some different avenues in the Union to respond to the needs of the students, faculty and visitors to campus, Bosco said.

"With the renovation project, we have the unique opportunity to expand our Union in many ways," he said. "We have to have our organization in place to respond to these new challenges."

Leadership of the Union is being restructured to meet the demands and challenges of responding to those needs, Bosco said.

"We're reorganizing, so we can gear up for a $9-million renovation and expansion of the building," he said.

The creation of the second Union director job will allow Sills to continue to oversee the day-to-day operations of the Union while the new director takes on the challenges of commercialization, Bosco said.

"We can't expect our staff to take on this expansion and the fiscal responsibilities without some help," he said.

Since 1956, the Union has had a strong commitment to service and programming, and Sills has provided outstanding service in accomplishing that mission, Bosco said.

With the enhancement and renovation projects, administrators, faculty and students are looking to expand to commercialization in the Union. The mission is shifting toward a different way of doing business, Bosco said.

"We can't expect bricks and mortar and golden arches to solve our problems," he said.

Campus organizations gather to protest Contract with America

K-State organizations got together Wednesday afternoon with one thing in common — an opposition to the Contract with America.

Several organizations gathered north of the K-State Union, participating in a national campaign to educate students about the contract.

Included with the protest was a dollar poll, in which students received 100 fake dollars and were able to allocate the bills into several different stacks responding to different areas of national expenditures. Education ranked the highest.

Aaron Wichman, senior in modern languages, said at the beginning of the month 22 colleges had signed up to participate in the nationwide event. He estimated that number has since risen.

"By now, I think it's a very safe assumption to say that there are over a hundred universities," he said.

Lach Franquemont, freshman in physics and philosophy and organizer of the event, said there were a number of issues the contract would change, but he wanted to focus on the negative effects it would have on college students.

"Primarily, we want to address education. They're looking to take Pell Grants and student loans from us, and that's going to force a lot of people out of higher education. This is something we need to stop," he said.

Jason Dechant, sophomore in pre-law and vice president of KSU Young Democrats, said he wondered at what cost the contract would be.

"Decreasing the deficit and a balanced budget are great ideas, but at what cost?" he said.

Twenty billion dollars in federal student aid would be cut if the contract proposal passes, Dechant said. This could affect 2 million students, he said.

NEWS BRIEFS

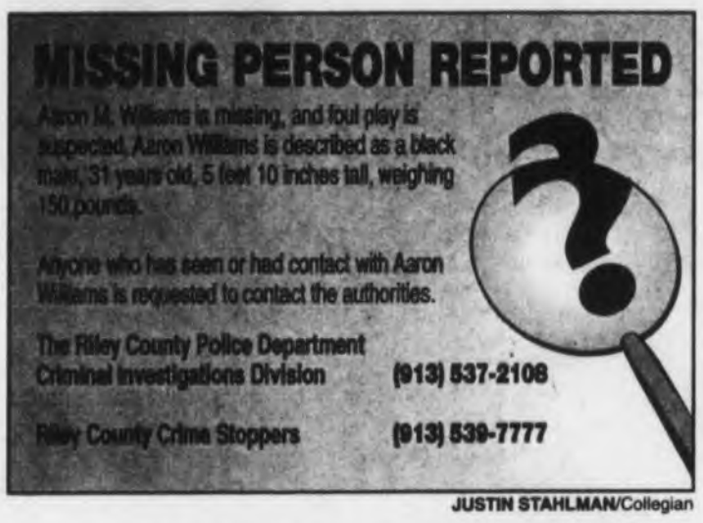
▶ HOUSE PROPOSES TO LIMIT FEDERAL REGULATIONS; SENATE DENIES

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Senate's unanimous rejection of a proposed freeze on federal rules Wednesday sent a message to House Republicans: Slow down your assault on regulations.

Congress must not sweep out the good with the bad, one senator warned as the Senate, voting 100-0, pushed through a more modest alternative to a House-passed freeze on virtually all federal regulations. Providing regulatory relief is part of the House GOP's Contract With America agenda.

Instead of a one-year moratorium, the Senate's bill would give Congress power to block regulations on a case-by-case basis. Congress, by majority vote, would have 45 days to scuttle any regulation it didn't like. Any senator or representative could challenge a rule.

Sen. Don Nickles, R-Okla., who helped work out the compromise, said he considered it stronger than a temporary freeze because the new congressional powers would be permanent. He said it sends a message to regulators that Congress will monitor their actions.



But with its dramatic bipartisan backing and unanimous approval with not a single senator absent, the vote also made clear to House Republicans that the Senate will set its own course in responding to growing complaints about overzealous federal regulators.

▶ ANALYSTS SUGGEST USING DIPLOMACY

WASHINGTON (AP) — Despite calls by Republican presidential aspirants for more saber-rattling, outside analysts say quiet diplomacy is the best hope for winning the release of two Americans captured by Iraq.

Clinton administration officials, goaded by GOP presidential candidates Pat Buchanan and Sen. Richard Lugar of Indiana, publicly say they haven't ruled out military action.

But several analysts dismissed that as a farfetched course with scant prospect of success.

▶ STUDENTS HAVE OPPORTUNITY TO QUESTION POLITICAL CANDIDATES

Students will have the chance to ask questions of candidates running for city commission today.

The Union Program Council Issues and Ideas Committee is sponsoring a debate between the candidates from noon to 1 p.m. today in the Union Big 8 Room.

Students who live on campus can vote for members of the city commission for the first time this year because the K-State campus was annexed by the city.

The debate will allow students to get a better idea of who the candidates are and their positions, Patrick Carney, Issues and Ideas Committee chairman, said.

The format of the debate will be similar to that of other debates.

"It will start with a small introduction from each of the candidates, and questions will be asked by a moderator," Carney said.

At the end of the debate, the audience will be given the chance to ask questions of the candidates.

Students are encouraged to participate by asking questions or just listening, Carney said.

"We want many students to show up. Now that we've been annexed to the city, the city issues are just as important to students," he said.

▶ LOS ANGELES BOY WINS 5-YEAR BATTLE WITH HIV, AMAZES DOCTORS

NEW YORK (AP) — A Los Angeles boy who was infected with HIV at birth apparently fought off the infection and is virus-free at age 5, astonishing his doctors.

Dr. Yvonne J. Bryson, a pediatrician and AIDS specialist at the UCLA School of Medicine in Los Angeles, said she believes it is the first carefully documented case of someone casting off all signs of infection.

Tests proved conclusively that the boy was infected for at least a month during the first two months of his life. Later examinations found no sign of the virus, Bryson said. Doctors have no explanation.

Bryson said she and her colleagues are studying the boy's immune system for clues that could be used to stop AIDS infections in others.

"It just opens up a lot of things to look at. Before now, there was such skepticism about the possibility that this could occur," said Bryson, whose findings appear Thursday in the New England Journal of Medicine.

Bet on a tight budget for 1996

COBY HESS
Collegian

Kansas' lieutenant governor said she is not in support of the lottery, but she understands many voters do not share her opinion.

"A lot of money from Kansas is going into Missouri's gaming boats, and as far as Kansas lottery is concerned, I think the voters and buyers of the tickets speak their opinion every day as to whether or not lottery will be re-enacted," Sheila Frahm said.

Frahm visited K-State to speak on Wednesday afternoon in the K-State Union Ballroom. Her original intent was to talk about women's issues; however, the majority of her speech covered the Kansas budget, farming and lottery issues.

Frahm said even though she is not a supporter of the lottery, she is aware of where those dollars go.

"Lottery brings in $45 million a year, and the dollars go to economic development programs that support small businesses and towards prison construction and maintenance," she said.

Frahm said right now lottery is tied up over the issue of whether or not to have slot machines at Kansas' racing tracks.

Frahm said dealing with Kansas' tight budget is a process of give and take.

"We do not borrow money as Kansans, and I am certainly glad that we do not go into debt, but there is going to be some need for revenue," she said.

Frahm said the process of cutting state government to stay within the budget is moving quickly.

"The voters have voiced their opinion that they want less government, and there will be more cuts made, which will enforce reduced government, yet ideally,the best thing would be not to relieve the 8 to 9,000 state employees," she said.

Frahm said the Legislature is also working to keep Kansas farm programs subsidized.

"So little of the agriculture budget goes to agriculture, and with the price of corn and wheat remaining the same for the past 50 years, it is hard for farmers to absorb escalated costs," she said.

Frahm said right now her mind set is on dollars because the recent legislative sessions have dealt mainly with the budget.

"To respond to needs for more dollars is interesting. To reorganize these needs is a reality," she said.

Frahm also spoke about issues facing women in the work force.

"Issues concerning women in the professional world need to be looked at," she said.

Some issues Frahm said need to be addressed are sexism in promo-

District court rules college discriminatory

ASSOCIATED PRESS

PROVIDENCE, R.I. — Brown University discriminates against female athletes because fewer women than men participate in college sports, a judge ruled Wednesday in a decision that could force schools nationwide to revamp athletic programs.

U.S. District Judge Raymond Pettine gave Brown 120 days to come up with a plan to comply with Title IX, the 1972 federal law prohibiting sex discrimination at schools that receive federal money.

Pettine's ruling came in a 1992 lawsuit filed by female athletes at the Ivy League school, who claimed Brown had violated the Title IX requirement that schools offer equal athletic opportunities to men and women.

"At Brown, far more male athletes are being supported at the university-funded varsity level than are female athletes, and thus, women receive less benefit from their intercollegiate varsity program as a whole than do men," Pettine ruled.

University officials said they will appeal.

"This is a major victory for women across the country," said Lynette Labinger, lead attorney for the female athletes.

"This ruling should serve as a wake-up call to universities around the country that they better start complying with the law or face a court order to do so."

During the trial last December, Brown lawyer Walter Connolly had warned that if the school lost, universities across the country would be forced to cut men's athletic teams.

In his ruling, Pettine said that was not necessarily so because there are several ways for a school to meet Title IX.

"It may eliminate the athletic program altogether; it may elevate or create the requisite number of women's positions; it may demote or eliminate the requisite number of men's positions; or it may implement a combination of these remedies," Pettine wrote.

Title IX requires a school to have a substantially proportionate ratio of female to male athletes, expand its athletics to meet women's interests and abilities, and maintain a program that fully and effectively meets the interest and abilities of female students.

Brown offers an equal number of men's and women's sports — 16 — but many more men than women participate.

One reason is that some teams are larger than others. The Brown football team, for example, has 126 slots for athletes, but the largest women's team, crew, has only 50.

The judge noted that during the 1993-94 academic year, there were 555 male athletes and 342 female athletes. The percentage of female athletes was 38 percent that year, while women accounted for 51 percent of the campus population.

"The gender balance of Brown's intercollegiate athletic program is far from substantially proportionate to its student enrollment," Pettine said.

Morning-after pill safe, effective

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — Most doctors don't recommend morning-after pills, and few patients know they are a safe, effective and legal way to interrupt a possible pregnancy, according to two surveys.

A small group of doctors, public-health officials and family-planning workers is trying to change that.

They have written a book, "Emergency Contraception: The Nation's Best Kept Secret," that includes a list of 1,477 doctors willing to prescribe the pills, and they have posted the list on the Internet.

The surveys were commissioned by a nonprofit health research group, the Kaiser Family Foundation.

"Our country prides itself on people having choices and, given the twin problems of unintended pregnancy and abortion, you would think this ought to deserve closer attention," Dr. Mark Smith, executive vice president of the foundation, said Tuesday.

But many abortion opponents are against the use of the morning-after pills, too.

Morning-after pills are high dosages of regular birth-control pills that interrupt the implantation of a fertilized egg into the wall of a woman's uterus.

Doctors can legally prescribe them, but no drug company has ever sought to market the contraceptives as a morning-after pill. Nausea and vomiting are common side effects.

The morning-after pill is different from RU-486, the French-made drug that actually induces abortions.

RU-486 is currently being tested in the United States but does not yet have approval from the Food and Drug Administration.

Advocates say morning-after pills work 75 percent of the time and can be taken up to three days after sex, not just the morning after.

In a survey of 270 sexually active women who didn't want to become pregnant, 60 percent had heard of the pills, but only 20 percent knew they can be taken up to 72 hours after sex.

A total of 47 percent said they would be likely to use the pill if necessary to prevent an unwanted pregnancy.

The survey, conducted by telephone last fall, has a margin of error of plus or minus 6 percentage points.

In a separate poll of 300 obstetrician-gynecologists, nearly all were familiar with the procedure. Some 88 percent called it safe, and 85 percent called it effective.

Some 56 percent objected to abortion and would never perform one. But of that group, 84 percent didn't have the same objections about the morning-after pills.

Nearly all the doctors said they rarely suggest the procedure to their patients. The doctor survey has a margin of error of 5.7 percentage points.

Abortion opponents are opposed to more widespread use of the pills.

"The time that the sperm and the ovum come together is when life has to be protected because a new human being has come to be at that time," said Shannon Hall, a spokeswoman for the Pro Life Action League.

The sensitivity of the abortion issue is a main reason why drug companies have never sought permission from the government to market the pills.

IN OUR OPINION

by the Collegian Editorial Board

Elections policy should give all candidates coverage

It's springtime. It's student election time.

Elections rarely pass without the Collegian being accused of favoritism or unfairness.

This year, we have a game plan.

Letters about any candidate, from any candidate or about the election in general will not run on election days.

Presidential and vice-presidential candidates will write one guest column the week of elections about their platform, to defend themselves if necessary or to say anything else that needs saying.

Their other opportunities to reach the readers will be in the voters' guide and in the general news stories.

There will be no guest columns from senatorial or other SGA candidates. (We can't run 100 of them.) We will accept letters to the editor from these candidates with no unconditional guarantees of running all of them.

We just don't have the space.

We ask candidates not to write letters of endorsement or to explain their platform. We provide space in the voters' guide for students to explain their platforms.

These letters will run at the discretion of the editor and opinion editor. And we won't play favorites.

Letters of endorsement from students not involved with any candidate's campaign are acceptable but again are not guaranteed to run due to space constraints.

The Collegian is doing its best to be fair to all candidates, and if you have any questions or comments about our elections policy, feel free to call the newsroom at 532-6556 and ask to speak to the opinion editor, Christy Little, or the editor, N. Stewart "Neil" Anderson.

If any candidates would like more space to express themselves than the Collegian can give them, the number for the advertising department is 532-6560.

Musician Cat Stevens finds the road to happiness through work with Muslims

RICK BLASING

GUEST COLUMN

In the early 1970s, his music dominated the charts throughout the world.

With tunes that were melodic and lilting and lyrics that were often probing and introspective, he existed as a prominent voice of the generation.

He was Cat Stevens, a British-born songsmith and poet who created a worldwide following with such songs as "Peacetrain," "Morning Has Broken" and "Moonshadow."

Cat Stevens commanded worldwide attention throughout the 1970s. His lyrical skills distinguished him in the musical world as millions of fans related to the spirituality and quest for knowledge evident in many of his songs.

In 1977, Cat Stevens embraced Islam, and as a part of this transformation, he became known as Yusuf Islam. The last Cat Stevens album, "Footsteps in the Dark," was released in 1984 and included liner notes to the public explaining his conversion.

Always concerned with issues of youth and children, Yusuf Islam felt led to pursue improved education opportunities for Muslim children in England — his home then and now. In 1983, he founded the Islamia School in North London. Islamia grew rapidly in popularity throughout the 1980s, and by 1989 Islamia Schools Trust included a Girls Secondary School. Islam said the school has "thousands on the waiting list."

Today, Islam maintains his duties as Chairman of the Board of Governors at Islamia.

In addition, he was recently re-elected as chair of the Muslim Aid organization, a group that works to assist Muslims worldwide in such places as Bosnia-Herzegovina. At age 48, as an educator, husband and father of five, Islam maintains a busy schedule.

In December, Islam addressed the Seventh International Sirah Conference in California. Organized by the Islamic Society of Orange County (ISOC), the Sirah Conference discussed the life and teachings of the prophet Muhammad. The conference also focused on issues relating to education, youth, the family and media perception.

Assisting the ISOC at this conference was the Council on Islamic Education (CIE). The CIE, directed by Shabbir Mansuri, provides information on Islam to educators as well as working closely with textbook publishers in an effort to correct erroneous stereotypes about Muslims.

Islam joined educators from around the world in addressing issues relating to education, tolerance and multicultural education. In a rare interview granted at the Sirah Conference, Islam discussed his school in London and his perceptions about anti-Muslim bias in the world media.

Islam observed with pride that Islamia School is "the top school for exam results" in that particular area of London.

He noted that Islamia School offers a superior education, "a good cause, a moral system — back to basis, ... excellence in academics."

Islam has concluded that government acceptance is "a political decision — not an educational one, because educationally we are doing better than they are."

Islam noted that it is "a vision of Islamic education" to teach non-Muslim students in the future.

Islam observed that the unwillingness of the British government to embrace Islamia School is an example of the prejudice and intolerance, frequently fueled by media inaccuracy, that characterizes the Muslim experience in education and in society. Islam claims that the media likes to define things in simplistic terms of good and evil.

"People are in that kind of mode of identifying something they don't understand as being evil," Islam observed.

"People are in that kind of mode of identifying something they don't understand as being evil," he observed.

Islam implored the West to accept different ideas and cultures as its source of strength, not viewing something different as a threat or challenge. Islam concluded the following:

"The most important thing is that if you keep the doors open, things flourish. If you shut the door, things die, and the culture will die.

"Whatever made it flourish will die the moment you shut the door, because one of those who wants to come in is going to help you. God gives blessing to those who keep their doors open."

For Islam, there is hope for the future. He works daily to improve the quality of education for the children.

He observed that "the believer is the optimist," that "God who made all of this, is merciful ... that no matter what tests you go through there is always a reason to stick through and try and find out."

Many years ago, a musician known as Cat Stevens wrote a song titled "On the Road to Find Out." As evidenced through his words and deeds, Yusuf Islam appears to have found his answer.

Civil Rights Act should exclude homosexuals

Gay rights is shaping up to be the civil-rights issue of the decade.

Today, homosexuals view themselves as carrying the same torch of justice and equality blacks carried in the great civil-rights crusades of the 1960s.

In reality, homosexuals are on a bizarre civil-rights tangent that seeks to gain special rights for a select group who choose a particular lifestyle.

JOHN HART

According to gay-rights advocates, homosexuals are being denied jobs and housing for no other reason than being gay. They hope to bring justice to this situation by making it unlawful to discriminate on the basis of sexual orientation.

The Civil Rights Act of 1964, in part, prohibits employers from discriminating because of race, color, sex, religion or national origin.

Gay-rights advocates want to add sexual orientation to the list, yet doing so would set a disastrous precedent.

Sexual orientation is a complex issue. Human beings are not rabbits — we have the option to exercise self-control in our sexual behavior.

The human distinctions outlined in the Civil Rights Act are involuntary and amoral except for religion, which only entails belief, not practice.

The state does have the right to prohibit certain religious practices that violate other laws, such as Satanic rituals that include animal mutilation and human sacrifice. Sexual orientation is the oddball of the batch.

Would it be OK if homosexuality were involuntary?

Homosexuals already have their rights.

What they are seeking, then, are special rights.

The U.S. Constitution already guarantees homosexuals equal rights. The 14th Amendment provides all citizens, gay and straight, equal protection under the law and due process of law.

If the Civil Rights Act were extended, it should include all groups. The best choice is to not extend it any further.

Including sexual orientation in the Civil Rights Act would put a civil stamp of approval on the homosexual lifestyle.

The phrase sexual orientation is far too broad. Sexual orientation could include any sexual orientation from bestiality to sadomasochism to pedophilism to heterosexuality to homosexuality.

If gay-rights advocates only want special protection to be allotted to homosexuals, on what grounds do they exclude persons of varying sexual orientations from enjoying the same privileges?

Why choose one lifestyle among many and attach it to the end to the most important piece of civil-rights legislation of the century?

It is ironic that homosexuals are so committed to achieving equal rights when they are one of the most affluent and successful of people in our nation. However, material parity with the rest of America is not the true aim of gay-rights advocates.

What they really want is society to endorse the gay lifestyle as morally acceptable or at least ignore it.

Galvanized by AIDS.

▶ CITY COMMISSION

Think before you vote

Dear editor,

A week before spring break began, some friends and I submitted a letter to the editor in response to Student Body President Jeff Peterson's March 10 column, "K-State Student Belongs on City Commission." In this letter, we dared to suggest that Justin Kastner — despite being a student — might not make a good city commissioner. Because of the length, our letter was not printed; here is a revised letter.

In his March 10 column, Peterson showed his support for candidate Justin Kastner and encouraged all students to do the same by voting in the April 4 city election. Peterson tells how Kastner is an essential link between the city and the campus.

In addition, a letter in Tuesday's paper also supported Kastner for the same reason. However, neither the column nor the letter gave any direct evidence that Kastner intends to strengthen the Manhattan-K-State relationship. I feel that I have paid fairly close attention to the commission race, and not once have I seen Kastner officially take a stand on any University-related issue.

Peterson and the letter writers only tell what Kastner ideally could do for the campus as a commissioner, but never once do they tell us Kastner has actually said he plans to do any of these things. True, it is nice to think that because Kastner is a student he will automatically do what is best for the University, but in reality, all students — all people — are different.

Just because a candidate is affiliated with the campus doesn't mean that he or she will be an asset to K-State. A current city commissioner and another candidate are both faculty members, yet Peterson never tells us that their political endeavors have noticeably strengthened our University. And why is this? Could it be that different people — despite belonging to the same group — actually have different thoughts and ideas?

Astounding idea, no?

This letter is not meant to be a personal attack against Kastner. Though I don't know him personally, I am sure that he is a very nice guy. However, politically and economically, I disagree with him. Take, for example, the Forest City rent abatement fiasco. For those of you unfamiliar with this ludicrous political move, here, in a nutshell, is what happened: a few years ago, Forest City Enterprises of Cleveland, Ohio, the company that manages that Manhattan Town Center, claimed that the mall's occupancy and property values were down.

Instead of insisting that the management company live up to its contract with our city, the city commission agreed in a 3-2 vote that Forest City just didn't have to pay rent to Manhattan for the land the mall was on.

In short, even though Forest City should be paying us $185,000 for a 10-year period, they are paying us nothing. Once the 10-year period is over, the city will have lost $2 million. Even though occupancy and property values have now significantly increased, Justin Kastner, in the second candidate forum, said he favors this rent abatement and that he would vote to continue keeping this money out of our city.

And speaking of the forums, why hasn't the Collegian covered these? There have now been four (the first Kastner didn't attend), and one would assume that if the paper has room to print two-page feature stories singing the virtues of getting drunk on your 21st birthday, perhaps they could see fit to print a few issue stories. Perhaps I'm misguided as to what is important and newsworthy.

Though this letter is somewhat lengthy, I hope that the whole thing will be printed without being edited, as I feel that the Collegian has been lax in presenting all sides of the commission race to its readers. In our original letter, my friends and I asked all students to register by March 20 and vote on April 4.

Unfortunately, the date to register to vote in the city elections has passed. However, I still urge those who can vote to do so, and, more importantly, I urge them to fully know and understand the relevant issues and the various candidates' positions on these issues. If you like what Kastner stands for, then, by all means, vote for him. But voting for someone just because he or she is a fellow student is naive; it could also prove harmful for the future.

Please come to the candidate forum at noon, March 30 in the Union Big 8 Room and find out the facts for yourself. Ask Kastner and the other candidates specific questions instead of making blind assumptions. "What can our city gain if you are elected?" and "Specifically, how do you plan to help K-State?" In short, learn, think and vote. Thank you.

Roller living

Story by Christi Wright

Photos by
Cary Conover

Members of the K-State Roller Hockey Club watch as a teammate searches through some bushes for a ball that bounced over the fence.

When the weather starts to warm up, students take to the streets on in-line skates.

"Rollerblading is a fun and entertaining activity. People can do it seriously or casually and just have fun," Todd Gurss, Ballard's sporting goods manager, said.

In-line skates can be rented or purchased at several locations in town.

If people are interested in purchasing the skates, they can rent them before they make the investment. Manhattan stores carry skates in children's and adult's sizes.

In-line skates can be rented for about $10 to $15 a day.

Used skates can be purchased for about $15 and up. New skates can be purchased for about $90 to $350.

"People can come in and sell their rollerblades or trade them in on a new pair," said Jim Sigurdson, general manager of Play It Again Sports.

Children's skates can be purchased at a cheaper price, but stores have trouble selling them to children because they grow out of the skates quickly.

"The kids love it now, but we have a problem selling to them because of their growing feet. The cost inhibits the parents from buying them because they outgrow the skates so fast," Gurss said.

For those who want to purchase their own skates, choosing the right ones can be a difficult decision.

"There are millions of skates on the market now. I use Roller Blade brand skates because they last a long time, and they're guaranteed. If you buy good ones, it's a good investment. You can buy a good pair of roller blades for around $100," said Glenn Kipp, member of the K-State Ice Hockey team and in-line skating instructor.

Some people start with buying cheap skates to learn on before making the investment in a better pair.

"I'm on my second pair now — this time I got a better pair. I started rollerblading in high school on a trail over by the zoo park in Wichita," Cindy Moen, sophomore in elementary education, said.

Warm weather brings out the skaters, and the spring is the biggest time for sales and rentals.

"We sell and rent the most in the spring during March and April. Our biggest clientele is the students ,and the sales decline when the students leave in the summer," Gurss said.

Though in-line skating has recently become a craze, the sport has been around for years.

"I have never rollerbladed in Manhattan. I used to in high school with my friends in Wichita. We would rent them and skate down by the river," Michelle Baker, sophomore in advertising, said.

In-line skates come in many sizes and styles for every skater, from the inexperienced to the advanced. Some parents are hesitant about buying skates for their children because children outgrow them quickly.

In-line skating is similar to roller skating and ice skating.

"I think it's easy. I just had a hard time getting used to the stopper on the back of one skate. It doesn't stop you completely, so you have to stop by going in a circle or turning sideways," Kelly Myers, senior in animal science, said.

Some people enjoy in-line skating for the fun and exercise.

"I started rollerblading in April of last year. I think it's a good exercise. It builds up the legs, and it's a good cardiovascular work out," Kipp said.

Kipp also teaches in-line skating through the Manhattan Parks and Recreation Department.

"We started a roller hockey club, and about three of the players on the team are also on the K-State Ice Hockey Team," he said.

The campus provides a nice location to skate, but most skaters try to avoid large crowds.

"I'm not very good at stopping yet, so I don't do well around a lot of people. I haven't been around campus much. The pavement isn't very smooth. I like to go to the Bramlage parking lot where the surface is smooth and there's nothing around," Myers said.

Safety is a concern to in-line skaters. However, protective gear is available to keep the injuries at a minimum.

"The biggest risk is wrist injuries because when people wipe out, they try to break their fall and end up hurting their wrists," Myers said.

For some people, in-line skating is not as easy as it looks and can even be dangerous.

"The first time I rollerbladed was with my friends at Sedgwick Park in Wichita. I wasn't going very fast, so my friends were in front of me. They turned around to see me lose my balance, and I slid on my butt with both of my legs in the air," Courtney Knapple, sophomore in speech, said.

Glenn Kipp, Manhattan resident and goalie for the K-State Roller Hockey Club, attempts to catch the ball during a practice last spring at CICo Park.

Baseball needs players like Sisler, Bancroft

Take me out to the ballgame ...

Summer's coming, and along with it follows the memory of the smell of the grass, shouts of hot dog vendors, players with cool nicknames and the roar of the crowd.

MIKE BUNCH

What does modern baseball have to compare? I guess the smell of green money, the heat of astroturf and stale beer spilled on you by obnoxious drunks.

Today's games and crowds would be almost unrecognizable by many of the great (and often forgotten) players of past days.

One of those forgotten players with an an usual nickname was one of the greatest batters in the history of the game, but he began his career as a pitcher.

His name was George. No, not George Herman Ruth ("Babe" to his friends and the rest of the world). It was "Gorgeous George" Sisler.

Originally a southpaw pitcher like Babe, Sisler began his career in 1915 and faced some of the outstanding pitchers of his day.

Twice in his rookie season he faced the Hall-of-Famer Walter Johnson and walked away with complete game victories. Not too many other pitchers could say the same thing.

Sisler's batting skills soon overcame his pitching ability and, like Babe, he was moved where his bat could do the talking.

By 1920, Sisler, then a first baseman, was lighting up opposing pitching and setting season records.

That year, he hit .407 with a league-record 257 hits. He had 19 home runs, scored 137 times and had 122 RBIs.

I'd say that's not too bad for a guy who a couple of years prior had been throwing balls instead of hitting them.

An outstanding performance in 1922 made him the league MVP.

That season, he led the league with 134 runs scored, 246 hits, 18 triples and 51 stolen bases.

Sisler also had the league's highest batting average, a modern day American League-record .420.

Included with those impressive numbers are a 41-game hitting streak, 105 RBIs and, most impressive, 14 strikeouts in 586 at bats.

A career batting average of .340 ties Sisler with Lou Gehrig on the career list, and his 2,812 hits put him 31st on the all-time list.

Sisler received the respect of his peers, including Ty Cobb (not known for his praise of others), who said Sisler was the nearest thing to a perfect ball player.

In recognition of his skills and accomplishments, he was elected to the Hall of Fame in 1939.

Shortstop is a position that is often overlooked, with most people unable to name more than a couple of greats at that position.

David "Beauty" Bancroft was a team leader, solid hitter and a good defensive player.

Bancroft came into the league in 1915, the same year Sisler did, and became the team captain of the Philadelphia Phillies immediately.

That season, he led the team to the National Pennant after a sixth-place finish only a season earlier. His leadership was so respected, team manager Pat Moran claimed Bancroft was the difference in the season.

With hopes of National League pennants, the San Francisco Giants acquired Bancroft in 1920 and immediately made him the team captain. The following season saw the Giants win the first of four straight pennants.

He moved to the Boston Braves organization in 1924, his natural leadership abilities serving him well as the player/manager of the club until 1927.

Bancroft's defensive skills matched his leadership abilities and earned him great respect.

He tied Rabbit Maranville's record of 1,046 defensive chances at shortstop. This impressive record hasn't been approached in more than 70 years.

Bancroft's 2.5 putouts per game place him at the top of the all-time list.

He is also second on the all-time list for average chances per game at 6.3. Compare that number with Ozzie Smith, most people's ideal modern-day shortstop, who has an average of 5.3 chances per game.

Most shortstops in the game are chosen for defensive skills and are not known for batting prowess, but Bancroft doesn't exactly fit the mold.

Bancroft was a solid hitter, reaching his peak in the middle part of his career. In 1922, he hit .299 and followed that mark with .300 or better averages for five of the next six seasons.

"Beauty" Bancroft was elected to the Hall of Fame in 1971 to honor his abilities and leadership.

In the early, rapid-growth years of baseball, many great players were adored and respected by fans across the country.

It is unfortunate that the same no longer applies to today's game.

We need to bring back players who bust their asses and are proud to play the game.

Hot dogs that cost less than an arm and a leg and cool nicknames would also be a great return to the stadiums.

Netters get a big win at Mizzou

BRIAN THOMAS
Collegian

The K-State tennis team opened up Big Eight Conference play with a convincing victory for the second straight year.

The Missouri Tigers proved to be no match.

The Wildcats, now 7-6 overall and 1-0 in conference play, whipped Mizzou 9-0 Wednesday in Columbia, Mo.

Last season, the Cats defeated the Tigers 6-1 in Manhattan for their only Big Eight win of the season.

This match was over from the start. On the day, the Wildcats dropped only five games.

As expected, K-State's top-ranked singles player, Karina Kuregian, had no problems beating Jen Lauck 6-1, 6-0 for her seventh straight victory.

Karen Nicholson and Dinah Watson both cruised through their matches, defeating Jenae Fowler and Rachel Wright, 6-0, 6-0 respectively.

Rounding out the singles division, Chris Schulte defeated Trujana Thomas 6-0, 6-1. Nikki Lagerstrom handled Maggie Overfelt 6-0, 6-0.

Brooke Brundige completed the singles sweep with a 6-0, 6-1 win against Lesley Harris.

Kuregian and Martine Shrubsole, the No. 14 doubles team in the country, finished off Fowler and Wright 6-0, 6-0 in No. 1 doubles.

The teams of Nicholson/Watsonand Schulte/Lagerstrom completed the victorious conference opener.

Wildcat tennis coach Steve Bietau said his team got to work right from the start.

"I think everybody had the right attitude going in and were ready to play," Bietau said.

"We didn't have any mental letdowns and just took care of business."

For Lagerstrom, a sophomore from Olathe, it was an overall good day.

"It was a fun day of tennis," Lagerstrom said.

"We all had a little competition going in to see who could come off the court the fastest with a win. I think Karina won with about 28 minutes, but it was a good day for us all."

Next up for K-State is a match-up with Oklahoma State. OSU will enter with the No. 43 ranking in the country.

Action, weather permitting, is scheduled for 10 a.m. Sunday at the L.P. Washburn Tennis Complex.

K-State has won four games in a row and is looking to "Build on the streak"

PHILL SPIKER
Collegian

It's four and counting.

Wednesday afternoon K-State clobbered Regis 12-1, extending its winning streak to four games.

This is the Wildcats' longest winning streak since the 1994 season, when they opened with four straight wins.

K-State	12
Regis	1

With the win, K-State raised its overall record to 12-9.

K-State opened the scoring in the second with a Scott Poepard home run into the right field pine trees. David Hendrix would then double down the first-base line and would later score on a double by Heath Schesser to give the Cats a 2-0 lead after two complete innings.

K-State opened the floodgates in the bottom of the third, scoring five runs to extend its lead to 7-0.

"Offensively, we did real well," K-State coach Mike Clark said. "We had seven runs in the first three innings."

Regis finally got on the board in the top of the fourth when Ranger catcher Justin Carlton was hit by a pitch with the bases loaded.

That scored first baseman Justin Sato from third for the Rangers' only run.

K-State would score again in the bottom of the fifth when Hendrix crossed the plate on a smash single through the infield by Schesser, which gave the Cats a 8-1 advantage.

The Cats would tack on four more runs in the bottom of the sixth, giving them a 12-1 lead.

The K-State attack was led by Chris Hess, who went four for six with an RBI and two runs scored.

Poepard went two for four with three runs scored, two RBIs and two home runs, which were his fifth and sixth of the season. Schesser had three hits and three RBIs.

Adam Novak (1-0) got the win, pitching seven innings and giving up one run and seven hits.

Clark said the game really didn't have any negatives to reflect upon.

"We played good defense. Adam gave us seven strong innings, and offensively we hit the ball really hard," Clark said.

"I thought today we went out and executed real well. We did the little things real well and gave ourselves the opportunity to get a big lead and give some players who needed playing time some time on the playing field."

Novak said he attributed his confidence in his teammates as a factor going into the game.

"I just went out there and concentrated on throwing strikes," Novak said. "I had confidence in the guys backing me up."

Despite having as much as an 11-run lead, Novak said he had a hard time keeping his concentration.

"In the fourth inning, I kind of lost a little concentration, and they got that run on me. But then I shut them down," he said.

With the Cats hitting the road to play Iowa State during the weekend, Clark said the Cats need to keep the good play up in Ames, Iowa.

"Anything you get on the road is a plus," Clark said. "It's an opportunity for us to go out and continue playing good ball."

Novak said he thinks the team is ready to build on its newfound success.

"The team's spirit is up. We are ready to get out there and keep winning."

Clark said he agreed with Novak.

"We got four wins in a row, and hopefully we can build on that streak."

K-State finishes third, sixth at SW Missouri State Invitational

BERNIE HANEY
Collegian

The men's and women's golf teams couldn't manage three solid rounds at the Southwest Missouri State Invitational.

The women's squad was eight shots out of first place heading into the third round, but struggled to make a final charge at Southwest Missouri State and Missouri and finished the tournament in third place.

"The conditions were right for us to make the comeback, but we just didn't execute," K-State assistant golf coach Tim Jennings said.

"It is as simple as that."

The women have played nine rounds of golf in three tournaments over the past nine days.

The team earned a sixth-place finish in the Lady Bronc Classic, a 10th-place finish at the Texas A&M Bookstore/Welsh Memorial Tournament and its best performance of the spring season at the Southwest Missouri State Tournament.

"It is our highest finish of the season, so hopefully we can carry the momentum on to our next tournament and then to the Big Eight Championships," Jennings said.

The leading finisher for the Wildcats at the Southwest tournament was Junior Debbie Chrystal, who carded a three-round total of 254.

That put her in sixth place, which is the best finish of her career as a Wildcat.

"Debbie is probably the most improved player we have on the team," Jennings said. "She is a great example for the rest of the girls."

Jacque Wright also played three consistent rounds to finish in seventh place with 255 strokes.

The senior placed in the top 10 in two of the tournaments and had a 16th-place finish at the Texas A&M tournament.

The women will have a couple weeks of practice and then will travel to Norman, Okla., for the Eskimo Pie/Susie Maxwell Tournament.

The men's team struggled in the first two rounds of the Southwest tournament but managed to shoot the second-best team score on the final round for a sixth-place finish.

"The first round was embarrassing. The second was marginal, and the third was more like what I had expected to see here," K-State golf coach Mark Elliott said.

The men's squad hadn't played in a tournament the previous two weeks. They opened up the spring season March 13-14 with a first-place finish in the Southwest Classic at Austin, Texas.

Junior Scott Hovis paced the Wildcats with his second consecutive top 10 finish, tying for sixth place. He fired a sizzling two over par 74 to finish seven shots off the lead.

Elliott said he knows the first two rounds were ugly but remained positive on the team's attitude.

"I've got a good group of guys here. They never gave up after the first and second rounds," Elliott said.

"Our scores for the first 36 holes were not due to a lack of effort, but they certainly were disappointing rounds."

The men's team will play a little closer to home in next week's tournament in Wichita. K-State will be battling in the Diet Pepsi/Shocker Classic.

TRACK CLIPBOARD

▶ WENTLAND BIG EIGHT TRACKSTER OF THE MONTH

Wentland

K-State senior trackster Gwen Wentland has been tabbed Big Eight trackster of the month for March, marking the second time this year and the third time in her career she has taken this honor.

Wentland finished the indoor season winning the high-jump competition at the U.S. Indoor Track and Field Championships in Atlanta with a personal record of 6 feet 5 inches. A week later she earned her third all-America certificate with a runner-up finish in the high jump at the NCAA Indoor Championships in Indianapolis on March 11.

Entering the outdoor season five days later, Wentland cleared 6'4" in the high jump portion of the College Station Relays heptathlon to tie Jackie Joyner-Kersee's American record, which also established a new collegiate American mark.

Wentland finished with 5,063 points, which broke the previous K-State record by 231 points.

FOR SHAWN AND JOAN MORRIS, FOUR GIRLS MAKE A

FULL HOUSE

The entire top of the Morrises' fridge is reserved for the girls' formula bottles.

Two hands, two bottles and two hungry girls. Joan works double-time to feed Jordan and Mallory. A feeding schedule is kept on the wall to make sure that the babies are fed at the proper intervals. During the day and on weekends, Joan has K-State students and volunteers to help out with feeding.

The birth of a child is a blessing.

The birth of five children is insane.

But Shawn and Joan Morris, Manhattan, are living proof that it can be done.

In July, Joan gave birth to quintuplets at Stormont-Vail Regional Medical Center in Topeka after only 24 or 25 weeks of pregnancy.

Mallory Morris was born naturally on July 10. Her siblings, Holly, Kasey, Jordan and Evan, were born by Caesarean section on July 13. Evan, the only boy, died July 29.

"Everyone kept asking me how I was going to do it," Joan Morris said. "The truth is, I didn't know how until it happened."

Three of the babies returned home from Stormont-Vail in Topeka in October. At that time, the fourth child was transferred to Memorial Hospital in Manhattan and released Nov. 23.

Joan Morris said it felt good to have the whole family at home for Thanksgiving.

"Finally the whole family was together. The only problem was that I was used to all the nurses doing everything. Then suddenly, I was handed all these babies," she said.

Using a cordless phone allows Shawn to feed Jordan and speak with a friend at the same time. Shawn has cut back on his hours at work in order to help with the girls.

Now 8 months old, the babies are developing their own personalities, Joan said.

"They are all laughing, talking, playing with things and recognizing each other. Plus now they're all rolling over. It almost seems like there's nowhere to walk with all of these babies rolling all over the place," Joan said.

When the children are sleeping, they are each hooked up to four independent heart monitors to make sure their hearts are beating at a stable rate.

Joan said the long cords attached to each of the children's chests gets to be inconvenient. Whenever the cord becomes detached from a child, a loud, high-pitched noise goes off, signaling the monitor is unplugged.

This can happen when anyone tries to hold the children at a distance farther than the cord will allow or even when the babies are stretching in their sleep, Joan said.

But doctors say the monitors should come off by July, and Joan said she is looking forward to it.

"I'm even looking forward to them crawling. Most people think I'm kidding, but I'm not," she said. "In just a few months, they'll be able to hold their own bottles too. I think right now is the hardest stage, when they cry and you wish you knew what to do."

When the babies get fussy, Joan said she tries to be positive.

"They don't do it on purpose. They just don't know any better," she said. "I keep thinking it'll be better in an hour. But in the meantime, it gets frustrating."

Because Shawn Morris works during the day, Joan has several people to help her take care of her little bundles of joy. Two K-State students help the Morrises during the evenings, and volunteers assist the family every afternoon.

Christina Houk, junior in elementary education, said she enjoys the work.

"I love kids, so it's easy for me," Houk said. "Now, I know when I have one, I'll remember I took care of four. Then I'll say 'I can do this' — or at least I hope I can."

The Morrises have acquired a handful of baby articles, including two cribs, four rocking swings, two double strollers, as well as numerous toys, stuffed animals, mobiles, lullaby music players and pacifiers.

But what they use most are diapers.

"Each of them probably go through 12 diapers a day. I change them before each feeding and sometimes after, which means all together, we probably go through about 45 to 50 diapers a day," Joan Morris said.

A wipe-off calendar also records the times when each of the children are fed. Where most families use the four columns for the weeks in a month, the Morrises write in the children's names and follow a regular feeding schedule.

Shawn Morris said it is hard to keep all the children happy at the same time.

"It always seems like they wake up and start feeding at separate times, and you think it's going to work out. But then, they all decide that they want to eat at the same time," he said.

In addition to trying to live a normal family life, the Morrises recently traveled to California for an appearance on a television show that aired Wednesday.

"We were invited to be on 'The Marilu Show.' They were doing a show on multiple births, and we fit the category," Joan Morris said.

"And the girls were real good — they didn't act up or anything."

After filming, the family had the chance to tour Los Angeles, Beverly Hills and Hollywood.

"I wouldn't exactly call it a vacation, but it was good to get away. It certainly was nice to just have a break from everything," Joan said.

Looking back, the couple said they would not change the current situation.

"I've always loved babies and have always wanted twins," Joan said.

"If I did it all over again, I wouldn't change a thing, but I wouldn't advise it to anyone either," she said.

Shawn Morris said he's happy with his new family.

"I thought it would be pretty hard, and we proved that," he said.

As soon as the babies learn the words "wait your turn" or "take a number," Shawn said he thinks everything will be worthwhile.

Heart monitors are used to make sure that the girls' hearts are beating properly. If a problem occurs, a high-pitched noise sounds, alerting the parents that either a cord is unplugged or a more serious problem has occured.

> "It almost seems like there's nowhere to walk with all of these babies rolling all over the place."

Students to travel to Russia, sample cultural highlights

LUKE WEHRMAN
Collegian

Students interested in studying the theater and dance of another culture will have the opportunity to experience it firsthand.

The K-State speech, theater and dance departments have organized a summer study-abroad program.

There are two different summer study programs to choose from in July. Students can study theater in Israel or theater and dance in Russia.

Norman Fedder, distinguished professor of theater, will be traveling with a group of students to Israel.

The students will attend plays and lectures on many different types of Israeli theater.

Fedder said students will get a sample of educational, community, professional and therapeutic Israeli Theatre.

"They will be observing plays and talking to leading educators," Fedder said.

Fedder said the summer program is not only for theater majors.

"Anybody can go," Fedder said. "It's geared towards all students."

Fedder said theater is a reflection of a culture.

"They will really get to understand the culture of the country," Fedder said.

Students will also be able to participate in theater. Fedder said students will be acting out scenes that reflect what they have learned and experiences they have had while studying in Israel.

Fedder said he has personal reasons for taking students to Israel.

"I have a specialty in Jewish theater," Fedder said. "It's part of my research interest."

Fedder said one strength of theater in Israel is that it is geared towards the communities' needs.

"They will really get to sample society," Fedder said. "It's important to get out of your culture and see someone else's."

Achmed Valk, assistant professor of dance, will be accompanying another group of students to Russia in July.

They will be studying at the Alexei Koltsov Academic Drama Theatre of Voronezh, Russia.

Valk said Peter the Great founded the Russian Navy in Voronezh.

"It's a historical place," Valk said. "Voronezh has seven professional theaters."

Valk said they will be studying various Russian playwrights, including the famous Stanislavsky.

"We're specifically focusing on the 19th-century Russian playwrights," Valk said.

Valk said they will be studying the playwrights in English translation.

The language barrier shouldn't be a problem because language tutoring will be provided.

"We will have basic Russian language every day," Valk said. "We also have interpreters 24 hours a day."

FOR INFO

Information on these two summer study programs can be obtained through the K-State Division of Continuing Education.

Valk said they will also be studying Russian dance.

"It will focus on basic principles of Russian classical ballet and Russian folk dance," Valk said. "They're famous for their folk dances."

Valk said at the end of the three weeks in Voronezh, they will spend two days in Moscow.

There will also be a public demonstration or performance of what they have learned while in Voronezh.

Valk said the summer program is open to anyone interested.

"It will be on exactly the level they are at," Valk said. "It's not going to be a stressful trip. It should definitely remain fun."

Valk said the trip will be a good opportunity to learn about the Russian culture.

▶ DRUGS

Kit will allow parents to check for drugs

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW PROVIDENCE, N.J. — Parents can check their children's rooms and belongings for drugs with a $20 kit that will provide them with confidential results.

Called DrugAlert, the kit can detect trace amounts of up to 30 illicit substances, including marijuana, cocaine, methamphetamine, heroin, LSD and PCP, according to its maker, Barringer Technologies Inc. of New Providence, near Newark, N.J.

The kit contains a moist pad that can be wiped across clothing, books or furniture to pick up drug residue. The pad can be mailed back to the manufacturer for laboratory analysis.

"Anyone who has been in contact with illegal narcotics will inadvertently acquire trace amounts of the narcotic," Stan Binder, Barringer's chairman and chief executive, said Wednesday.

"For instance, a cocaine user will have traces on his hands and clothing. These traces will find their way to his car, his school locker and objects in his room."

But Binder cautioned that a positive test result does not necessarily indicate a child is a drug user. Traces could be left by another person or picked up through innocent contact.

"Positive detection results simply provide one piece of information that should always be used with other observation," he said.

If Barringer detects drugs it mails the information back to the parent with advice on what to do. Parents can also get the results by phone, without revealing their names, by using a confidential code number.

The testing process destroys the sample, so there is no way it could be used as evidence in court, Binder said.

DrugAlert was introduced this week by Barringer, which helps police and the FBI test for illegal narcotics and bombs. It is being sold by mail.

One medical expert said Wednesday that the device might be beneficial, but a civil-liberties lawyer said he's concerned that corporations could use the kit to spy on their workers.

Dr. Larry DeMilio, of the Carrier Clinic in Bellemead, New Jersey, a psychiatric facility, acknowledged that some people might feel that such devices could poison parent-child relations. But he said that if a child is using drugs, that indicates there already is trouble in the relationship.

The bigger problem is parents ignoring signs of drug use, said DeMilio, medical director for child and adolescent services at the Carrier Clinic.

"On balance, it's not a bad thing," he said. "If it's a choice between doing nothing and doing this, I would much prefer seeing parents do this."

Bruce Marvin, staff attorney for the American Civil Liberties Union of New Jersey, said he's worried that employers could buy the device to conduct secret drug tests on their workers.

The ACLU said 15 states have laws that would preclude secret drug tests on the job. The only exceptions might be for people in safety-sensitive jobs, like machinery operators, the organization said.

"It's Up to You," but I would definitely recommend it.

Pacific Records' new recording artist, Perfect Stranger, takes off with its recently released album, "It's Up To You."

The four-member country group from east Texas began to come together about four years ago and toured clubs in the regional area until it signed with Pacific.

Touring with a variety of star acts, Tim McGraw, Lee Roy Parnell and Marty Stuart, for example, Perfect Stranger recently appeared in Manhattan with Western Flyer for a concert at TW Longhorn's.

The album is filled with some excellent country sounds ranging from a traditional love-sick ballad to an upbeat song about a woman that caught a man's eye.

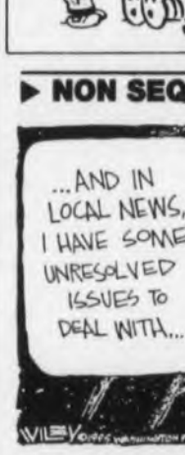
The title track, "It's Up To You," opens the album with a bounce and good harmonies.

The group allows the beat to carry the melody to the strong harmonies in the chorus of the song about the fate of a relationship.

"You Have the Right to Remain Silent" is the slow love ballad from the compact disc.

Steve Murray's strong country sound on lead vocals is backed by Shayne Morrison's bass line, Andy Ginn's drum rhythms and the smooth guitar sound of Richard Raines.

An up-tempo swing beat and bass line drive the song "I Ain't Never."



A cowboy tries to impress a young lady by complimenting her, "I ain't never seen nobody like you. .." It's a very fun, light-hearted song with a good dance beat to it.

Another slow ballad is "I'm a Stranger Here Myself," a song about being new to love. This song is an excellent track for slow two-stepping with your favorite dance partner.

For a little fun, the group sings about leaving the bar a little early in "Cut Me Off." I can relate to the the idea behind the song, "... lately I've had one too many, one too many times ..." I like it when a group has some fun with music and lyrics — it makes for a better album.

The band members recorded tracks for the album whenever they had a few days off between dates on the road, but it doesn't hurt the quality of the music in any way, shape or form.

Pick up the Perfect Stranger's CD and listen to it. You won't be disappointed. To hear samples of a couple tracks, check out the E-Collegian on the World Wide Web at http://www.spub.ksu.edu/

Falling in love with two men isn't fair

Dear Cassie

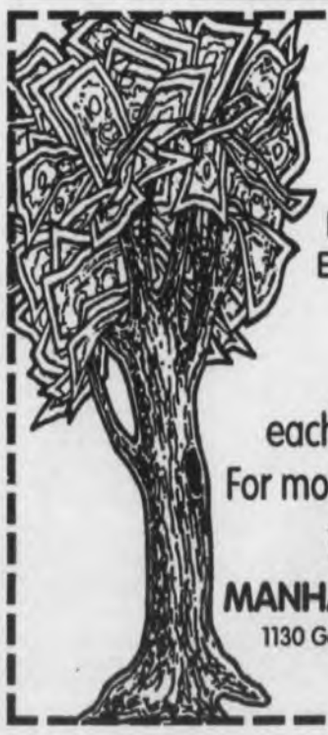
Help. I think I am in love with two guys at the same time. They are both fun, kind, considerate, loving, sexy, etc. One has told me he loves me, and the other says he's falling in love with me. However, each does not know about the other.

This has been going on for several months. I don't want to give up either one, but know when they find out about each other (which is bound to happen eventually), I will probably lose out on both. Is it possible to love two men at the same time?

Signed, Dazed and Confused

Dear Dazed,

Yes, it is possible to fall in love with two men at the same time, or three or four. But it's not fair that you have love affairs with more than one at a time without their knowledge.



Cassie

Gingrich defends budget cuts

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — House Speaker Newt Gingrich accused what he called reactionary politicians and reactionary reporters of colluding to mislead the public about legislation that replaces the national school lunch program with block grants to the states.

"Let me be clear about this. I think the school lunch fight was one of the most horrendously disgusting examples of demagoguery," the Georgia Republican told a conference Wednesday of the Acton Institute, a non-profit ecumenical educational and literary center based in Grand Rapids, Mich.

"What you had were a group of reactionary politicians and reactionary reporters colluding to deliberately misinform the people of the United States," Gingrich said.

Democratic Rep. William L. Clay of Missouri fired back saying, "As far as I'm concerned, anyone party to denying school lunches to 13 million poor children is guilty of colluding, exploiting, misinforming and stooping."

Gingrich's attack is the latest fallout from the angry fight over the Republican's plan to sweep away dozens of welfare programs, cede federal anti-poverty efforts to the states, and cut spending by more than $66 billion during five years.

The bill also denies cash assistance to several targeted groups: families on the rolls more than five years, mothers under age 18 and their children, and children born to women already on welfare.

The blueprint cleared the House Friday, and is running into skeptics in the Senate.

At a hearing of the Finance Committee, Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, said that as someone who is "pro-life," he did not believe in cutting off those who are least able to take care of themselves.

Sen. John Chafee, R-R.I., was also critical, saying the House seems to have lost sight of the goals of welfare reform.

"Instead of focusing on employability, how to reduce out-of-wedlock births and how to get at the knot of intergenerational welfare dependency, the focus seems to be entirely on how to save money and give states maximum flexibility," Chafee said.

Possibly one of the most contentious elements of the bill would replace the federal school lunch program with a block grant to the states.

Federal nutrition standards would be repealed, and the guarantee of a free school lunch to poor children would end.

The bill also lumps school lunches with school breakfasts and programs that provide milk, snacks and summer meals.

Spending on the entire package could increase by no more than 4.5 percent a year.

President Clinton's budget calls for a 3.7 percent increase in the school lunch spending from 1995 to 1996, following a 3.1 percent increase from 1994 to 1995, a fact often cited by Republicans to try to mute Democratic critics.

But because the GOP-proposed block grants must cover programs other than school lunches, the 4.5 percent increase would not match the spending level sought by the president.

An expanded breakfast program requested by the administration brings the Clinton figure to 4.9 percent.

Adding in money for meals or milk at child-care centers brings it to 5.2 percent.

Gingrich said opponents portrayed the legislation as "killing" school lunches.

"Now what was a fight over bureaucratic power became the willful exploitation by liberal Democrats and the willful exploitation by reporters of children, who were frightened with factually false stories to create the right emotional reaction," Gingrich said.

"Our opponents who favor the secular welfare state, and redistributionist economics, will stoop to anything to block our getting there," he said.

Players vote to end 7-month strike if ...

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — Major league baseball players voted Wednesday to end their 7-1/2-month strike if a judge issues an injunction restoring salary arbitration and free agent bidding.

U.S. District Judge Sonia Sotomayor has scheduled a Friday hearing on the National Labor Relations Board's request for an preliminary injunction.

There's no indication when she will rule.

The players' vote came as the union prepared to respond to the owners' latest offer.

Union head Donald Fehr, who met with acting commissioner Bud Selig for 90 minutes Tuesday, said talks were expected to resume this week.

If players end the strike, owners may try to lock them out.

But even hardline owners don't know if they can get the required 21 votes from among the 28 teams, and management officials, speaking on the condition of anonymity, said they doubted owners would lock out the regular players.

With the season scheduled to start in four days with replacement players, it appeared that a final decision to begin play wouldn't be made until the weekend.

Selig won't say whether opening day could be pushed back, but some teams — just in case — began planning for an extra three weeks of spring training.

Management's new proposal offered to keep the system of salary arbitration and free agency that was in effect during the expired collective bargaining agreement.

"I assume there's room for negotiation," Fehr had said Tuesday night before the union's executive board began a two-day meeting.

East German church corrupted by politics

ANNE HAZLETT
Collegian

Americans can learn about romance from the fall of communist East Germany.

"The East German experience has much to teach us about relationships between groups of people," said Richard Pierard, professor of history at Indiana State University, during a speech at the Ramada Inn Wednesday.

Pierard was the special guest leader for the 10th Parrish Colloquium. His lecture, titled "In Bed with the Authorities?: The Church and the Secret Police in Communist East Germany," was a discussion of the relationship between the Protestant church and the secret police in communist East Germany.

Pierard is the author of eight books and almost 100 articles in scholarly journals of history and religion.

Much of his work in the subject area is based on his personal experiences as a visiting Fulbright professor of history in Germany during the late 1980s, he said.

"During this time period, there was a sense of national paranoia in East Germany because the entire country was infiltrated by secret police," he said. "In order to survive, the Protestant church was forced to go to bed with the communist regime — to cozy up, if you will."

Secret police files opened following the reunification of Germany have revealed massive corruption within the church, Pierard said.

"I can recall the situation of a Lutheran pastor who, upon the death of his best friend, discovered he had been a secret spy for the Regime," he said. "This was a man with whom he had spent Christmas and to whom he had given a key to his house."

Pierard said it is situations of betrayal such as this that have led many historians and German citizens to question the credibility of the Protestant church.

"One of the most talked about issues today is the role of the church in the revolution," he said. "Many people believe it is necessary for the church to confess their betrayal to restore a credible image."

While infiltration of the church by secret police was common, there were also honest leaders campaigning for peace, Pierard said.

"A close friend of mine was an evangelist in the Lutheran church," he said. "He would hold prayer meetings for the youth, which upset the Regime, who wanted to control their young minds terribly. They hated him so much they offered him a free visa to leave the country, and he just wouldn't leave."

Pierard said Americans should not be quick to judge the German church for its ambiguous position during the revolution.

"One could say we could charge evangelical leaders in this country with going to bed with the politicians, with the lure of fraud," he said. "The German experience has much to teach."

Bob Linder, professor of history and colloquium organizer, said the purpose of the colloquium is to allow for the discussion of such ideas.

"The event allows for the analysis of new, creative and conversational ideas in the fields of history and religion in a small group setting," he said.

TIPS FOR WRITING A CLASSIFIED AD

Always put what item or service you are advertising first. This helps potential buyers find what they are looking for.

Don't use abbreviations. Many buyers are confused by abbreviations.

Consider including the price. This tells buyers if they are looking at something in their price range.

Republicans turn up heat, aim to pass term limit bill

Bill Richardson, D-N.M. "They're called elections."

In daylong debate, the House sifted through four rival versions of term limits before a final vote expected late in the evening. A two-thirds majority is required to send the measure to the Senate.

The first proposal — a 12-year limit written by Democrats to apply retroactively — gained only 135 votes, with 297 opposed.

The second — limiting lawmakers to three two-year terms — received only 114 votes, with 316 against.

Two other GOP alternatives, expected to receive the most support, would fix House limits at six two-year terms.

One of them would permit states to set their own limits, as 22 have done, while the other makes no reference to states' rights. All variations would limit senators to two six-year terms.

After a stumbling start on rounding up support for the measure, the Republican leaders turned up the energy in recent days, and Gingrich was expected to deliver the final speech on the House floor.

Several outside interest groups were given the use of Majority Leader Dick Armey's Capitol office just off the House floor for the day.

Inside, Cleta Mitchell of Term Limits Legal Institute said she and others were calling lawmakers and had lined up appearances on talk-radio programs around the country.

On the floor, Rep. Van Hilleary, a first-term Republican from Tennessee and author of one of the four measures, conceded in advance that the measure may well fail.

Still, he said, "We have the opportunity to hand back power to the people. We have the opportunity to end the era of the career politician."

Democrats ridiculed Republicans for refusing to make term limits retroactive.

In unusually personal comments, Rep. Luis Gutierrez, D-Ill., noted that Gingrich was first elected to Congress in 1978, yet now backs 12-year limits on service.

He said the speaker should go back to Georgia, because the 12-year limit that he wants to impose on everyone else has long ago passed for him.

Inclusion of term limits on last fall's Contract With America was a reflection of the political popularity of the concept, particularly with disaffected voters like those who backed Ross Perot in the 1992 presidential election.

Previous Democratic majorities in the House had bottled up these measures in committee, refusing to permit floor votes, and Republicans sought to capitalize on that point even as they headed for evident defeat on final passage.

There was a tacit recognition that the day's first-ever House vote on term limits was only the first step.

The American Conservative Union aired a television commercial in the Washington area criticizing 63 lawmakers it said opposed term limits, had bounced checks at the now-closed House bank and had several years ago voted for a congressional pay raise.

"Isn't it time to end welfare for politicians?" says the commercial.

While it was broadcast only in the vicinity of the Capitol itself, Bill Pascoe of the American Conservative Union said a videotaped copy had been delivered to each of the 63 lawmakers' offices as a warning of what might follow in the 1996 election campaign.

Contract supporters attend protest

the protest disapproved of the Republicans' plan.

Jay Goodwin, sophomore in political science, expressed support for the contract.

"The fundamental assumption that they make is that individuals are bad, and if left to their own devices, they'll be greedy bastards that don't ever give anything. But somehow if they get together in a group and call themselves a government, they're good," he said.

Steve Zubillaga, senior in radio and television, said he didn't think the protest was so much an issue of Democrats against Republicans as it was ignorance verses intelligence.

He said he favored the Contract with America.

"I tend to agree with just about everything they have to say," he said.

Goodwin said he wasn't bothered by the financial-aid cuts that are proposed by the contract.

"The fact is, look at the people who are coming to college now. Have you been in a class lately? I'm sitting here with people who can't write complete sentences. People who boldly proclaim, 'I don't like to read.' What the hell are they doing in college?" he said.

"You have to earn it. It's not a gimme."

To some, things may not be the way they used to be.

"In the '50s, we didn't have people starving in the streets and things like that," Goodwin said. "The only difference is that now people don't think. They don't realize that the money is better spent by individuals than it is by the government."

Near the end of the protest, some arguments flared, but no fighting broke out. Dechant said the protest was a good idea.

"Seeing people rally behind picket signs might get some people fired up, but it might turn other people off," he said. "Whereas having a political awareness day like this, with all this information that we're handing out, allows students to receive it a little bit more openly and allows them to ask questions instead of being feared by us or intimidated."

From the protesters' point of view, the event was successful, as 113 signatures were obtained on a petition against the Contract with America. All Kansas senators and representatives will get copies of the petition. The original signatures will be sent to the president.

"If you look at the newspapers, the more people are finding out about the contract, the more opposition is arising because of the fact the people are becoming educated to the issues," Dechant said.

Union aims to expand services for students was brought on by the challenges of commercializing the Union and a challenge from students to increase the revenue generated by the Union.

"It's time for us to look at our organization and respond accordingly," he said.

Students said they would make a $9.2-million investment in improving the Union and challenged the Union to increase its generated revenue to continue to serve the students and their needs, Bosco said.

"We have to look at this project as providing seed money for expansion of the building and our entrepreneurial mission," he said.

Bosco said he hoped to see the Union move into a lot of different areas of service and commercialization.

"Jack will continue to play a significant role in the Union and in the enhancement project," he said.

Sills said his new role would be determined by the new director once installation has occurred.

Susan Scott, associate dean of student life, will lead a committee of student leaders, faculty and Union staff members in the national search for the new director, Bosco said.

"We'll advertise in all the national higher education magazines, major markets and campus Union-type publications," he said.

Scott said she is working with Bosco and the committee on determining a timetable for installing the new director. A timetable should be set up in a week or two, she said.

Glickman confirmed by Senate

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Dan Glickman was handily confirmed Thursday as secretary of agriculture and pledged to get to work immediately on the 1995 farm bill.

The Kansas Democrat and 18-year veteran of the House Agriculture Committee promised to represent all of America and be an advocate for farmers and ranchers.

"The future of American agriculture is being debated right now, and I intend to be very active in that debate," said Glickman, 50, after the 94-0 Senate vote to confirm him. He was sworn in by Deputy Secretary Richard E. Rominger, who has been running the department since Jan. 1.

Glickman replaces Mike Espy, who resigned last year because of favors he received from companies doing business with the department. Though nominated Dec. 28, Glickman had to wait for an exhaustive background check.

"It's good to be here — finally," Glickman told reporters, adding that he would take a common sense approach.

"Pragmatic solutions to farm problems is what will serve farmers, ranchers and consumers better," he said, but declined to give details about his farm policy plans.

In his statement, Glickman also announced the department will hold six forums beginning April 17 on the state of rural America, leading up to a White House National Rural Conference in Ames, Iowa, on April 25.

"We want to hear what rural Americans have to say," he said. "We will incorporate what we hear into the administration's proposal for the 1995 farm bill."

The bill determines government price and income support payments for farmers, as well as trade, conservation, research, forestry, disaster assistance, nutrition and other programs handled by the department.

Glickman has worked on four such farm bills, one reason for his selection. This year's bill could be the most difficult because budget-cutting pressures are stronger than ever. So is criticism of traditional farm programs.

"Mr. Glickman will begin his tenure at an important moment in the Agriculture Department's history," said Sen. Dick Lugar, R-Ind., chairman of the Senate Agriculture Committee. "USDA is in need of strong leadership. It requires active management by a secretary who is knowledgeable, engaged and assertive."

Lugar has proposed cutting $15 billion from farm program spending over five years by ending a popular export subsidy program and trimming the crop subsidies for corn, wheat, rice and cotton.

The administration budget promises only $1.5 billion in unspecified farm program cuts over three years starting in 1998.

During his confirmation hearing March 21, Glickman said he wanted to go slowly in dismantling or trimming farm programs. "The system is not broken," he said.

Glickman was defeated last November in his bid for a 10th House term. President Clinton nominated him to head the Agriculture Department on Dec. 28.

Open House to show best of K-State

STACEY HAGER

Purple chalk paw prints on the sidewalks will lead children, alumni and perspective students from a magic show to a walk through a giant, beating heart.

More than 15,000 people are expected to be on campus Saturday for K-State's All-University Open House.

"We are expecting a large turnout," said Paula Ansay, senior in marketing and All-University Open House student coordinator.

The campus will be open for all visitors and students from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. and will include a variety of activities.

Matt Ford, senior in mechanical engineering and engineering Open House coordinator, said this will be the 73rd annual Open House for the College of Engineering.

The Open House idea began as a way to show the community new technology being used and developed at the University, Ford said.

What was started from the College of Engineering has grown to an All-University Open House and includes all of the nine colleges.

Visitors will have an opportunity to speak to students throughout every college.

"The most important thing is talking to students. That is more important than any video or display," said Angie Young, senior in journalism and mass communications and co-coordinator for the College of Arts and Sciences.

Some of the activities for the College of Agriculture will include sampling insects as human food, an exhibition known as the Little American Royal where students show livestock, and live radio spots with the B104.7 radio station.

The College of Architecture and Design will be displaying students' projects and dropping eggs from a platform enclosed in toothpick structures.

The College of Arts and Sciences will be exhibiting rats trained by psychology students to walk a tightrope, different musical groups in the Union Station provided by the music department, and pottery demonstrations from the art department.

Music festival to jazz up Manhattan

STEPHANIE SWISHER
Collegian

The Kansas City jazz tradition will live on this weekend with the fifth annual New Currents Jazz Festival at 6 p.m. Saturday at the Wareham Opera House.

Bryce Berquist, senior in human resource management and president of the New Currents Jazz Club, said this is the first year the festival has been off campus, and it is the largest festival yet.

"This is the first year for the festival to have a big-band performance, which is David Basse and the City Light Orchestra from Kansas City," he said.

Berquist said the festival is meant to broaden musical knowledge in the community.

"There's a lot of good music talent in Manhattan, and we want to give players a chance to perform," Berquist said.

He said the club also hopes to get the music scene sparked in Manhattan.

"A lot of people don't know what jazz is, so hopefully the festival will give them a good idea of what jazz music entails."

Tim Lindemuth, director of publications for the K-State Alumni Association and faculty adviser to the New Currents Jazz Club, said he also hopes the festival will increase jazz music awareness in the Manhattan community.

"The festival provides more opportunities for K-State students to perform for the public, and it is another outlet for people who appreciate jazz and new age music," Lindemuth said.

The festival will consist of five hours of music, starting with K-State's Concert Jazz Ensemble at 6 p.m., Berquist said.

A successful educational system in the 21st century will be giving the consumer whatever, whenever and wherever they want it.

"That's the reality of the world that we are beginning to create," said George Connick, president of the Education Network of Maine, during a Convocation Lecture Thursday in McCain Auditorium.

The challenge facing education in the 21st century will be linking the learner with the program, he said.

The Education Network in Maine is a combination of off-campus centers and sophisticated telecommunication technologies to extend educational opportunities to all residents of Maine.

Today, we are looking at a defining time in history, a paradigm shift, and the opening of a new frontier. This new frontier is altering all aspects of society by the movement of images, not people, Connick said.

Connick said we are changing from a society built around atoms to bits, the DNA of information, as the basic commodity of human interaction.

"These things are changing the way we live," he said. "But we are not there yet. While we are certainly in the information age, most information is still delivered to us in the form of atoms. It's newspapers; it's magazines; it's books; it's videotapes; and it's papers like this."

City commission hopefuls debate fund's allocation

MARY EMERSON
Collegian

The relationship between K-State and the community was the main topic of debate between candidates running for city commission.

Four of the five candidates were at the debate in the K-State Union Big 8 room, including Justin Kastner, Edward Horne, Bruce Snead and Steve Hall. Lex Pearson was the only candidate not present.

Use of money created by the City-University Enhancement Fund drew varied suggestions from the candidates. The fund was created for projects that would benefit both the University and city.

Animals trained for show

ANGIE STUMP
Collegian

More than 130 K-State students have been loaned a beef heifer, lamb, hog, horse or dairy heifer to prepare for the 67th annual Little American Royal Saturday in Weber Arena.

"It's a show put on by us," said Chris Mullinix, junior in animal science and industry and chairman of the LAR. "It is run for the students by the students with support from the faculty."

He said the LAR is open to any K-State student interested in learning about the livestock industry.

"There are just as many people that participate that haven't shown before as there are that have shown nationally," he said.

This will be the second year of competition in the LAR for Jeff Sleichter, senior in animal science and industry.

"It is a good experience, for example, for Johnson County students who have not had any experiences with animals before," Sleichter said.

Sleichter said he enjoys the competition and competed in several of these types of competitions.

"The competition is fun," he said. "Many of the people you are competing in the LAR against are the ones you competed against while you were growing up."

The contestants are allowed to go out and work with their animals at anytime during the day except during feeding.

Clinics are sponsored on how to train and fit the animals.

"That is where the learning happens," Mullinix said.

▶ LOCAL INVESTIGATORS DRAG KANSAS RIVER IN SEARCH OF MISSING MAN

Riley County Police investigators dragged the bottom of the Kansas River near Hunters Island Thursday morning looking for a 31-year-old man.

Aaron Williams, who was reported missing Wednesday, is a 31-year-old black male weighing 150 pounds. He is 5 feet 8 inches tall.

Police said they suspect foul play in connection with his disappearance.

Williams' car, a red 1988 Chevrolet Sprint, was discovered after 9 a.m. Wednesday off Collins Lane near Hunters Island.

The Riley County Police Department said they are investigating the case and would like anyone with information to contact them.

Capt. Allen Raynor of the RCPD said there haven't been any big leads on the case yet.

"We're still searching," he said. "We've received several calls, but nothing has really excited us."

Raynor said he could not comment further on the case.

Anyone with information can contact the Riley County Police Department Criminal Investigations Division at 537-2108 or contact Riley County Crime Stoppers at 539-7777.

▶ CLINTON PROPOSAL TO HURRY LOAN PROGRAM REJECTED

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Clinton's proposal to speed implementation of a new direct student loan program was rejected Thursday by Republican and Democratic senators despite their praise of the Education Department's administration of the program its first year.

"Many first-year participating schools hail the program as a success," noted Sen. Jim Jeffords, R-Vt, who chairs the Labor and Human Resources Committee's education subcommittee. But he said he wants to know more about long-term implications "before pushing forward too fast."

The Education Department is developing ways to track possible problems with direct loans, Deputy Education Secretary Madeleine Kunin told Jeffords at a hearing of his panel.

▶ VOTERS CHOOSE BLUE FOR M&M'S NEW COLOR

NEW YORK (AP) — M&M lovers will soon have the blues.

The results of a two-month campaign to choose a new color were unveiled Wednesday, and blue won with 54 percent of the more than 10 million votes cast. It beat out pink and purple for the honor.

"For the first time since M&M plain chocolate candies were introduced in 1941, America has voted for a new color to appear in the traditional mix," said Pat D'Amato, a spokeswoman for the Hack-ettstown, N.J.-based M&M-Mars.

In honor of the announcement, made on the 86th floor of the Empire State Building, the landmark skyscraper was lighted all in blue Wednesday night.

The blue candies will replace tan in bags of plain M&M's.

▶ WEEKEND FORUM LETS STUDENTS QUESTION COMMISSION CANDIDATES

Students interested in finding out more about the candidates for city commission before the election on Tuesday can attend a forum this weekend.

All five candidates for city commissioner have accepted invitations to attend a forum from 2 to 4 p.m. Saturday at the City Auditorium.

The forum will consist of moderated questions and the candidates' timed responses. The auditorium is located at the corner of 11th Street and Poyntz Avenue.

"The first hour and half of the forum will feature a moderator asking the city commissioner candidates questions about issues that they will be expected to deal with on a regular basis," said Diana Hatch, board member for South Manhattan Neighborhood Association.

The audience will be able to get involved in the forum so the candidates can get a feel for the general public's opinions.

"A half-hour will be given to the audience to ask the candidates questions about all kinds of issues around town," Hatch said.

The five candidates are Steve Hall, Justin Kastner, Edward Horne, Bruce Snead and Lex Pearson.

A sign-language interpreter will sign the forum for the hearing-impaired. The forum will be on channel 19 on Manhattan Cable TV.

Welfarist dedicated to animals

MIKE WELCHHANS/Collegian

Janice Swanson, assistant professor in animal science and industry, has come a long way from her fine-arts beginnings toward the animal-science industry.

SHELLY FOGLE
Collegian

While she was a graduate student, Janice Swanson, assistant professor in animal sciences and industry, was first affected by the actions of the animal-rights movement.

There was a break-in at a university by an animal-rights groups called the Band of Mercy, Swanson said.

The group released research rabbits owned by the animal-science department.

"It was my first awakening that some people were opposed to using animals," she said.

Since that incident, Swanson has dedicated her professional career to educating people about animals and their behavior.

Swanson said she is concerned about animal welfare, but she is not an animal-rights activist.

"If there are legitimate complaints we need to address them, not stick our heads in the sand and hope they will just go away," she said.

Swanson was recruited by officials at the National Agricultural Library while earning a doctoral degree in applied animal ethology at the University of Maryland at College Park.

She served as a technical information specialist at the Animal Welfare Information Center in Washington D.C.

The library is a division of the United States Department of Agriculture.

"There was a tremendous amount of information on all sides of the animal-rights issue," Swanson said.

"We were obligated to provide a decent repertoire of reliable information so people can make up their minds," she said.

She worked at the informational center for five years.

Although Swanson has dedicated her professional life to animals and their well-being, she started college as a fine arts major.

Following her third semester at the University of Connecticut, she changed her major to animal science.

"I was torn between biological sciences and the fine arts," she said.

Swanson remained active in the arts. Throughout college, she performed with a community theater group called the Hampton Players.

But ultimately, animal ethology was her college and career choice. Animal ethology is the study of animal behavior in domestic, captive and semi-captive species.

"I grew up having an interest and affinity to animals. I enjoyed caring for them, so it was natural for me to follow that discipline," Swanson said.

She earned a bachelor's and master's degree in animal science at the University of Connecticut.

As an animal welfarist, she said she thinks it is impossible at this time not to use animals for food and biological research.

Swanson said people in the animal-use industry justify animal use based on benefits to humans, such as in medical research.

She said she thinks most people do not know about research in animal laboratories, nor have they explored the cost and benefits of animal use.

"I do have a problem from an ethical standard with activities that do not exhibit widespread benefits to humans. I am not necessarily against those activities, but I do have a problem defending them," she said.

Swanson joined the animal-science department at K-State in April 1992.

She teaches Domestic Animal Behavior and Contemporary Issues in Animal Science.

"It is a field where men have been prevalent," Swanson said. "There are males that like to dominate, and there are males that like to cooperate."

Swanson said K-State faculty in the animal-science department have been extremely cooperative.

A goal of her teaching is to turn out students who are well-informed and have skills needed to confront issues in the industry, she said.

"She gives you information, then she lets you draw the conclusion," Brian Archer, junior in pre-veterinary medicine, said.

Archer said Swanson taught him how to think about the issues.

"My most important legacy will be left in my students. I hope my greatest contributions will be seen through my students," Swanson said.

In addition to teaching, Swanson advises animal-science students.

"As an adviser she has helped me considerably. As a teacher, she knows how to explain things," Janelle Williams, junior in animal science, said.

Williams said Swanson is a strong role model for animal-science students.

Swanson is the United States Regional Secretary for the International Society of Applied Ethology.

▶ SPRINGDANCE

Screens, photos featured in dance

BERNIE HANEY
Collegian

SpringDance will once again feature the set design of an assistant professor of architecture.

Robert Arens built two screens in which the dancers will move physically throughout a piece titled "Humble Narcissus Flash Passionate Zen" in the program at 8 tonight and Saturday at McCain Auditorium.

"It gives the dancers an opportunity to dance in a slightly different way," Arens said.

"I think people can appreciate the chances we're taking. I don't think we're doing anything evolutionary, but I think it opens up some opportunities for the dance program."

This is the second straight year that Arens has designed a set for the SpringDance program.

The set will include some writing by Patti Smith and photography of Robert Mapplethorpe.

"Photography is a major theme in this dance," Arens said. "I sort of approach architecture to a broad term, so I can see real strong parallels between photography and architecture."

Arens also said images and shadows will be projected onto the screens.

"Images are at times aggressive, yet we know instinctively that flowers are really gentle or fragile," Arens said.

"Also at times they appear almost sexual in some respect," he said.

Achmed Valk, assistant professor in dance and a director for the SpringDance program, said he believes people enjoy Arens' work.

"Last year, they certainly did," Valk said. "If you do something together, it's always compromise, and to me that's interesting.

"Because I may start at this point and the designer at that point, what you end up with is a whole different product that none of the two of you separately had in mind."

Arens said he has been working evenings and weekends on the set design for the past month.

"The construction work is really fun, and I personally like to make these kinds of things," Arens said.

"But I say the best part is to see the screens in place and to see the dancers respond to the objects."

A concern Arens mentioned was whether or not the audience would understand the content of the set design.

"Will everybody in the audience get it? It's hard to say. You can't be sure of that," Arens said. "It is to put the content in the piece, and then the people can interpret it the way they want."

SpringDance will be featuring nine different dances, and Valk said he thinks that this dance will be fun to watch.

"I think it will be appealing to an audience that is not just focused on dance, but I think it will offer a lot to people who like to think about things," Valk said.

Arens said he would like to offer his services again and maybe structure it as part of a class.

"I think it's possible, but it always depends a little bit on the schedule of teaching," Arens said.

"Certainly, if the opportunity arises, I would like to get involved again."

IN OUR OPINION

by the Collegian Editorial Board

Hard work goes into planning Open House

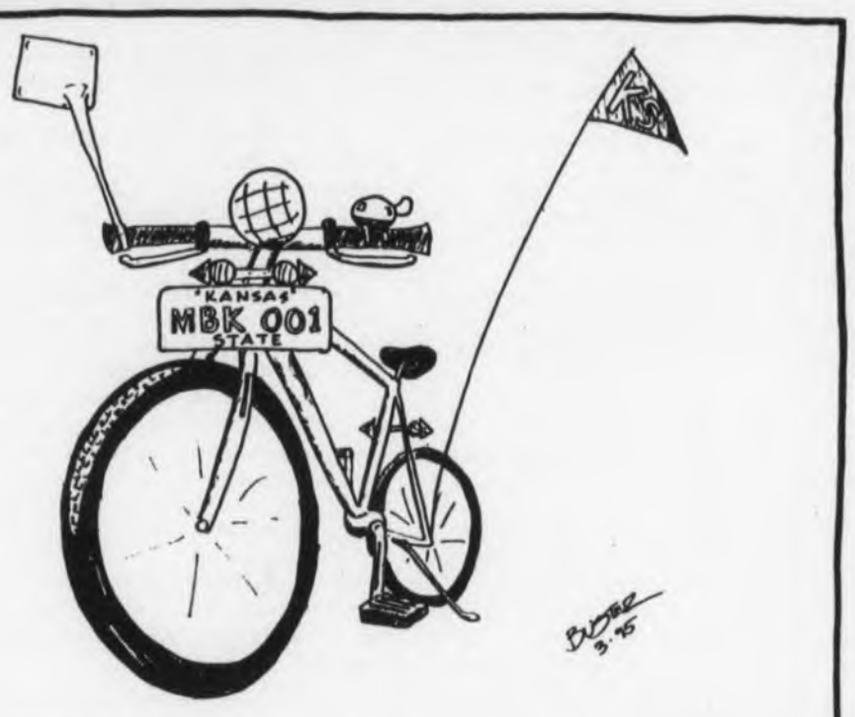
Open House will be a time when K-State recruits its best and brightest.

Thousands of people from all over will flock to K-State today and Saturday for the 73rd-annual Open House.

What began with the College of Engineering in 1922 as a way of showing new technology to the community has turned into an all-University event.

Open House has long been known as a time when prospective students and curious parents of K-State students come to the campus to see what it has to offer.

Hundreds of students from every college have planned for weeks in order to make Open House a success. They have donated their time and energy to put on demonstrations and show off the University. Those students deserve to be commended for their efforts.



Parades, booths, food, research demonstrations and magic shows are only some of what students have planned for Open House.

But Open House is not just a time for high-school students and parents to see the happenings of the University.

Students should take this opportunity to see what goes on in other colleges around campus. Undecided students can also shop around for a major.

Open House will undoubtedly be a time when K-State recruits its best and brightest. We wish the best of luck to those who put so much work into it.

'Contract With America' the answer to repairing America's economy

JOHN HART

Several groups opposed to the Republicans' Contract With America gathered outside the K-State Union Wednesday to protest its proposals.

Some of the groups participating included the Young Democrats, Students for Peace and Justice, and the National Organization for Women.

One goal of the protest was to expose various myths about the contract. In reality, the most common myths about the contract are those advanced by its opponents, liberals and Democrats.

The general myth is that the cold, uncaring Republicans in Congress want to punish the poor and cause schoolchildren to go hungry so they can pay for tax breaks for the greedy rich people of America.

The Republican proposal to reform the welfare system is, in fact, motivated by common sense and compassion. If decisive action is not taken to downsize government, our economy could collapse in the next few decades. This would hardly benefit the poor and underprivileged.

The Republican welfare-reform plan is essentially an effort to transform the welfare system from a hammock back into a safety net. They hope to do this by dismantling the federal system and then giving welfare funds to states in the form of block grants. State and local governments, who are more in touch with their communities than a Washington bureaucrat, will then develop programs to meet local needs.

The Democrats had 40 years to eliminate poverty with their welfare programs. Instead of empowering poor people, the welfare laws passed by Congress established a cruel cycle of dependency and helped increase poverty.

This is one reason among many why not a single Republican incumbent lost their seat in the last election, while the Democrats lost control of both houses of Congress.

Republicans aren't seeking to deny people necessary benefits but to reform a system that is inefficient and wasteful.

The most absurd myth about the contract is that Republicans want to take food out of the mouths of children in their effort to reform the school-lunch program, when the real aim of the reforms is to eliminate waste. The liberal media is a willing accomplice in advancing this myth.

This example illustrates the point that everything the media report should be taken with a grain of rock salt.

For example, the school-lunch director for a large school district in Kansas City, who wishes to remain anonymous, was interviewed by a local TV reporter about her reaction to the Republicans' plan to cut the school-lunch program. She said the reforms were necessary and the quality of the program would not be hurt, although some changes would need to be made. The reporter was dismayed by her absence of outrage at the proposed cuts.

The director said, "I didn't tell you what you wanted to hear, did I?"

"No, you didn't," the reporter said. The director's comments never made it into the evening news story.

This example illustrates the point that everything the media report about the contract should be taken with a grain of rock salt.

The final myth surrounding the contract is the claim by liberals that the evil policies of Ronald Reagan created the problems the contract is trying to correct. The problems the contract is trying to correct were those created by the Democratic-controlled Congress for more than 40 years.

Sure, Reagan did increase the debt by increasing military spending, but he also spent the Soviet Union out of existence and ended the Cold War. In doing so, he scored a victory for peace and justice by greatly reducing the risk of a catastrophic global nuclear confrontation.

Dale Herspring, head of the political science department and former State Department official, said the Reagan administration did unofficially pursue the goal of spending the Soviet Union into the ground.

In the annals of presidential history, Reagan will probably be remembered as one of the greatest presidents of the century, while Bill Clinton will make Franklin Pierce look like Winston Churchill.

Although the opponents of the contract did advance a few myths Wednesday, their efforts to educate the campus about the issues surrounding the contract were helpful. The contract isn't perfect, and we should seek to educate ourselves about its contents, particularly financial aid. Perhaps the College Republicans can respond with a forum of their own.

Power at the state level the way to go

First of all, I would like to congratulate whoever had the skills to pilfer an unarmed computer disk.

Let me explain. Before I left for spring break, my professors determined that the only class I had this semester was their own. Inundated by the massive amount of homework, I spent a plethora of hours within the confines of the computer lab in Dickens Hall.

JEREMY STEPHENS

After I finished a rather large assignment, I decided to return to my humble abode and consume mass quantities of analgesics, otherwise known as Tylenol, because doctors recommend it most. (No blatant commercial endorsement intended.) In my haste to leave, I forgot to remove my computer disk from the machine. Upon discovering my mistake, I returned a half hour later to find that it was gone.

At the time, it was more frustrating that I would have to do the assignment all over again than the fact that someone took almost a dollar's worth of plastic that didn't belong to them.

However, it occurred to me that this is a reflection of a deeper problem within our society. This is not to say the FBI should open a bureau to deal with floppy-disk theft, but that the concept of respecting other people's property no longer holds the importance it once did.

No, society as a whole does not loot and pillage at will, but those who choose to do not receive the deterrent necessary to make changes to their behavior. One of the root causes of this is a shift from dealing with people as individuals to dealing with them as classes or groups.

With the advent of sociology in the 1800s, the emphasis was shifted from dealing with the behavior of the individual (Jim, Mary, Kato) to what group they belonged to (the poor, the rich, those sick of watching the O.J. trial). If Jim committed a crime, it was not because he chose to but because society forced him to do it. By removing the stigma from an individual's wrongdoings and focusing on how to improve a label, deterrence has been thrown out in favor of improving a social class.

The same philosophy is being used to defend our present welfare system. Looking beyond the rhetoric of who is trying to hurt women and children the most, the real issue lies in how to end dependency on the government's welfare rolls.

After all, if compassion is defined as how many people are on welfare rather than how many people no longer need it, why don't we all just drop out of college and go on welfare? Then our politicians could be truly compassionate and we could re-elect them year after year to thank them for their compassion.

Many view compassion as redistributing wealth between two social classes. In reality, money is not just being taken from the rich and given to the poor. Money is being taken from the Lopez family and given to the Smith family. There is a difference.

Some will never be satisfied that the poverty problem is solved because there will always be some who are poorer than others.

If the lowest income in the United States is $100,000 and everyone drives at least 3 cars, there will still be poor people in relation to who is the richest.

However, if the Smiths improve their condition, they are no longer poor as an individual family, and this should be the goal of welfare.

If welfare is not actually improving conditions for individuals in this country, should we not dispose of it and look to other methods for improving the conditions of our citizens?

I am not being mean-spirited here. I am simply pointing out that 30 years after Lyndon B. Johnson's War on Poverty began, the poverty level has not decreased as its proponents claimed it would.

This is not to say the FBI should open a bureau to deal with floppy-disk theft, but that the concept of respecting other people's property no longer holds the importance it once did.

We have watched families deteriorate and inner cities fall apart in an effort to allow some people to feel compassionate about how they try to legislate happiness.

Government is inherently impersonal because it is not possible for it to address the concerns of every person in this country on an individual basis, and the government is forced to make legislation for the entire country or for groups. This is to say that trying to help groups very rarely helps individuals.

Therefore, it is logical for concerns to be addressed at levels of government that are more responsive to individuals, such as state and local governments.

This is why the GOP's Contract with America is trying to shrink the size of the federal government and send its programs back to the states.

This is not to say the Contract is the end-all solution for reform, but it is a place to start.

The past 40 years have indicated that enlarging government is not effective, so why not give devolution a chance?

The goal should be for individuals to be equally content, rather than equally worse off by the burden of the federal government. Think about it. It's an individual choice.

Jeremy Stephens is a sophomore in business.

▶ SYMPOSIUM

Critic didn't attend conference

Dear editor,

In a March 28 letter to the Collegian, Paul A.S. Runyan launched a sarcastic but uninformed attack against K-State's recent symposium on "Western Humanities, Pedagogy and the Public Sphere."

Runyan did not attend the symposium, but he makes numerous false claims about it. For instance, he charges (after perhaps reading the symposium schedule) that Professor Robert Miklitsch's paper was about the need to throw out courses on e.e. cummings and Shakespeare for classes on "Melrose Place."

If Runyan had attended the conference, he would have known that Miklitsch did not make this absurd suggestion (it is apparently Runyan's invention), and neither did anyone else at the conference.

If Runyan had attended the conference, he would have also realized that the presentations on pedagogy focused generally on the need for more classroom discussion and more peer interaction (not on "indoctrination").

Because his charges are so blatantly false, because he has no evidence to support his claims, because he did not even attend the conference that he criticizes, his attack is unfounded and unreliable.

Although he talks mainly about the conference, the real object of his attack seems to be feminism (the wildly radical notion that women are human beings and not property) and multiculturalism (the equally radical recognition that our society is already composed of peoples from diverse cultural backgrounds).

Runyan does not exactly have reasons for opposing feminism or multiculturalism, yet he wants us to believe that they now threaten us.

I did attend the conference, and what I heard was a lot of discussion about the role of humanities education in a democratic society.

Some participants made the observation that free (that is, open to everybody), thoughtful, well-informed, and rational public debate — the cornerstone of any real democracy — was disappearing. Sound bites, mean-spirited attacks and ridiculously sensational diatribes have replaced reasonable, educated debate. After reading Runyan's letter, I see more clearly their point.

Perhaps Runyan just doesn't know how to make a reasonable, informed argument.

Or perhaps he does, and he just doesn't give a hoot about rational debate, the truth, or democracy.

But if he does care and would like to learn how to argue in a persuasive and reasonable manner, I would like to suggest that he enroll in one of the English department's writing and rhetoric courses, where he will learn a great deal about how to present ideas clearly and how to support those ideas with evidence.

"Melrose Place" might not be on the syllabus. He'll have to watch that at home.

Let's work on the math skills

Dear editor

I was taken aback today (March 28) when upon browsing your "Reader's Right" section I found too ledders stacked one upon the other presumably signed by 96 students, but which contained shocking erorz in arithmetic.

The first (signed by a senior in secondary education and 21 others) claimed that 22 classes out of a total of 2,341 classes constituted .009 percent.

Let's sea — by that reason (or calculation) all 2,341 classes out of a total of 2341 classes would constitoot 1 persent!

The sekond (signed by a senior in mekanical enginearring and 73 others) claimed that selling a transcript that cost 50 cents for three dollarz constituted a mark-up of 600 perscent! Hmmm.

By that reasoning (or calculation) if it were sold for just 50 cents that would be a mark-up of 100 perscent.

How's the following for a compromize? The University provides transcrypts free of charge, but deletes any credits for mathematics (or other ourses that rekwire quantitative reasoning) for those students who make such arithmetic blunderz.

▶ FARM BILL

Nation depends on agriculture

Dear editor,

I recently contributed to an article addressing the 1995 Farm Bill. Although the article was well-written and researched, I would like to follow up on the theme "Federal Budget Cheats Farmers."

At .4 percent of the federal budget, farm program payments do command a small portion of federal spending.

In my opinion, this is something we should champion, not complain about.

Farm program payments are designed to stabilize food prices by supplementing producer incomes.

If there is one thing that Americans hang their hat on right now, it is stable food prices.

On the average, over the past 20 years, food prices have increased 4.5 percent annually.

The non-food sector of the economy has increased at a rate of 6 percent over that same period.

The average American devoted merely 8 percent of his or her income to put food on the table. That 8 percent is the lowest in the world.

The average European spends 17 percent, and in Japan, they shell out nearly 20 percent.

Consistent of this thought, for every dollar that the United States spends on domestic farm programs, the European Union spends three.

The European Union has also outspent the United States by a six-to-one margin on export subsidies over the last five years.

Let's remember that the U.S. agricultural exports total more than $43 billion annually and provide the country with positive agricultural trade balance of nearly $18 billion.

Agricultural exports also generate about $100 billion in related economic activity, which pushes about $8 billion back into the federal budget in the form of income-tax revenue.

Agriculture is our nation's largest industry, accounting for nearly 16 percent of America's gross domestic product and employing one out of six people working in the United States today.

Therefore, I am not sure we can honestly say that U.S. farmers are cheated in the process. I am willing to applaud their efficiency, to which they owe Kansas State University a debt of gratitude. Research, development and extension is the backbone of this effort to deliver a safe and economical food supply to you and me.

We elected a Congress, which is driven to harness government spending ad balance the federal budget.

In the process, farm-program payments will probably be decreased again. I say "again" because they have decreased by nearly 60 percent since 1986.

I think we can look at agriculture as a model and realize that the talent and ingenuity of a motivated industry will take over where the government payments leave off.

Continuing this period transition in agriculture will be necessary to keep export markets open, but we are catching a glimpse of what reduced tariffs, import restrictions and subsidies can do for the competitive spirit of U.S. agriculture.

Join the lively, bawdy pilgrims on the local vicarage lawn for the finals of the annual Geoffrey Chaucer Storytelling Competition. Tales are told of love, lust and laughter. Some are traditional and visual; others are, in the funniest and most good humored way, a little less delicate. The New Vic's raunchy and rambunctious rendering is not perhaps one for purists, but is definitely one that would have Chaucer rolling in the aisles.

K-State looks to extend its 4-game winning streak against Iowa State

NICOLE POELL
Collegian

Ames, Iowa. With its cold temperatures and high winds, it's not exactly a favorite playing site among visiting teams.

So why are the Wildcat baseball players so anxious to get there this weekend?

"The team's spirit is up," K-State pitcher Adam Novak said. "We're ready to get up there and keep winning."

Funny what a winning streak will do to a person.

The Cats will try to extend their four-game streak as they take on the Cyclones in this weekend's three-game series.

Although the 'Clones currently hold down the No. 3 spot in the conference standings, K-State coach Mike Clark said he's confident his Cats can continue to win.

"We've got four wins in a row, and hopefully, we can build on that streak," he said. "Anything you get on the road is a plus, so it's an opportunity for us to go out and continue playing good ball."

K-State played nothing but good ball throughout the week in home wins against Nebraska, Regis and Creighton.

The Cats fell behind early in Tuesday night's doubleheader action but came from behind during the sixth inning in both contests to rack up 11-8 and 5-4 wins.

"The second game was excellent," Clark said.

"The first game, we survived. That first game was just ugly, but sometimes you've got to win some ugly ballgames."

Wednesday's game with Regis was nothing but ugly, as K-State tallied a convincing 12-1 victory against the Rangers.

The Cats jumped ahead 2-0 after two innings of play but took control of the game with a five-run third. Leading the way for K-State at the plate was Chris Hess, who was four for six with an RBI.

Clark said he was proud of his team's overall performance after that outing.

"We played good defense," he said. "Adam gave us seven strong innings, and offensively, we hit the ball really hard.

But the Cats don't have much time to enjoy their recent victories. Clark said his team must be prepared for Iowa State.

"They've got awfully good pitching. They're always a very solid team defensively, got good defense, and they went two for three at Oklahoma and OSU, so they do a little bit of everything," he said.

"But they're a very good ballclub and a team that we've got to play well against. If we don't go and play some good baseball, we'll have some negative things happen.

Cats look to stay undefeated in weekend match-up against OSU

"We're going to have to keep improving and be ready to compete with Oklahoma State."

STEVE BIETAU
K-State tennis coach

BRIAN THOMAS
Collegian

The K-State tennis team is looking to make it a 2-0 start in Big Eight Conference play this weekend.

After an impressive 9-0 win against the Missouri Tigers in the conference opener Wednesday, the Wildcats enter Sunday's home match with the Oklahoma State Cowgirls with some confidence.

The Cats improved their overall mark to 7-6 with the victory against Mizzou.

The win also wrapped up a six-match road trip for K-State in which the team went 4-2.

Wildcat tennis coach Steve Bietau said his team came into the Missouri match ready to work.

"I think everybody had the right attitude going in and were really ready to play," Bietau said.

"We didn't have any mental letdowns and took care of business."

The Wildcats will need to carry that same attitude into this weekend. Coming into Manhattan is a Cowgirl team ranked No. 43 in the country, according to the Rolex Collegiate rankings. OSU finished last season with a 7-3 conference mark for third in the Big Eight.

Leading the way for Oklahoma State is Kym Hazzard, the nation's No. 82-ranked singles player.

In doubles, the Cowgirls are tied with the team of Hazzard and Tasmin Wainwright for the No. 21 ranking in the country.

K-State matches with its own firepower, though.

All-American Karina Kuregian, No. 26 in singles, looks to extend her seven-match winning streak and improve on her 21-5 record.

The team of Kuregian and Martine Shrubsole, ranked No. 14 in doubles, takes a 14-1 record into the Oklahoma State match, including a string of 10 straight victories.

Bietau said he would like to see his team maintain its intensity.

"We've done a good job in our last couple of matches and have gotten some confidence," Bietau said. "We're going to have to keep improving and be ready to play to compete with Oklahoma State."

Action, if temperatures cooperate, is scheduled for 10 a.m. Sunday at the L.P. Washburn Tennis Complex.

Cowboys enjoying their Final Four trip to Seattle

ASSOCIATED PRESS

SEATTLE — Oklahoma State's basketball team was all business when it arrived Thursday for the Final Four, stopping briefly at its hotel before heading to practice.

The team's chartered flight left Stillwater about 9 a.m. CST, stopped in Oklahoma City to take on fuel, and arrived in Seattle at noon PST. The players were off-limits to the media who were waiting when the team arrived at its hotel in suburban Bellevue.

"Today we're not going to do any sight-seeing because it's been kind of a tiring trip and we're going to practice here in a few minutes," Coach Eddie Sutton said in the hotel lobby. "Tomorrow I think we'll try to let them see some of the sights."

The Cowboys, winners of the East Regional, play No. 1-ranked UCLA in a semifinal Saturday.

Sutton had considered putting his team in a hotel other than the one designated by the NCAA, saying he was concerned about the hoopla that surrounds the Final Four. But he decided his senior-laden team was mature enough to keep its focus.

"I think that's where discipline comes in and managing your time," he said. "We tell all our players there's a time to work and a time to study and a time to practice basketball. We're going to try to do that here."

Sutton looked and sounded weary after the four-hour flight from Oklahoma, but said he wasn't.

"I'm not tired, but I think I'm about to lose my voice," he said. "I've been doing too much coaching, I guess."

Before the Cowboys left Stillwater, about 2,500 people showed up at Gallagher-Iba Arena to send the team off.

"Let's go down to Seattle and let's go out and get this championship," point guard Andre Owens said.

The fans were about half in number as those who waited up until 3 a.m. Monday for the Cowboys to return from winning the East regional in New Jersey.

"We had to be here to support the Cowboys," said junior Matt Brooks. "I was hoping it would be more packed, but ..."

"This is a late-night town," said Sara Youngquist, finishing the thought.

The ones who were at the doors of Gallagher-Iba at 7:30 a.m. were not disappointed. The arena seats only 6,381, and any noise is generally loud noise.

"Five years ago, when I came here, I had a dream we would take the Cowboys to the Final Four," said Sutton, who played under Henry Iba in the 1950s. "I didn't think it would happen this quickly, but it has."

In the spirit of the day, Sutton told fans the Cowboys enjoyed cutting down the nets after winning the Big Eight tournament in Kansas City, Mo., three weeks ago, and cutting them down after winning the East Regional last weekend in East Rutherford, N.J.

K-State Open to showcase local talent during the weekend

WESS HUDELSON
Collegian

Several members of the K-State track team will get a breather this weekend.

Coach Cliff Rovelto said about one-half of the team will compete this Saturday in the KSU Open.

The meet starts at 1 p.m. with the pole vault, long jump and triple jump.

Running events begin at 1:45 p.m. and will proceed according to a rolling time schedule.

"We are going to hold a lot of kids out who put in two tough weekends in Texas over spring break, giving them a chance to rest and train through the week," Rovelto said.

Gwen Wentland, Jill Montgomery, Wanita Dykstra, Belinda Hope and Karissa Owens all competed at the NCAA Indoor Championships, the College Station Relays and the Southwest Texas University dual.

Nicole Green, who surpassed the automatic qualifying standard in the 400 meters at the College Station Relays with a time of 52.6, also will not compete.

Rovelto said those who haven't competed yet will get a chance.

"We are looking for some of the kids who haven't competed yet to go out and have good efforts and giving some who don't get many races indoors the chance to round into racing shape," Rovelto said.

Partial teams from Barton County Community College, Butler County Community College, Garden City Community College, Fort Hays State University, Nebraska and Kansas also are expected to compete.

Kristen and Kirsten Schultz will compete Saturday, but not in their marquee event — javelin, Rovelto said.

The twin sisters both posted provisionally qualifying marks in the event at the College Station Relays.

Kristen qualified with a mark of 163 feet 1 inch, and Kirsten qualified with a heave of 159'.

"We have a lot of good performances for it being so early in the season," Rovelto said.

"In particular, the sprinters and jumpers have put up some solid times and marks.

"At College Station, Kristen and Kirsten threw about as well as they have ever thrown the javelin."

K-State will take its best to Austin, Texas, April 7-8 for the Texas Relays.

Smatterings

BY SMATTERER X

Smatterings were piecemealed together with snips and snails and puppy dog tails and the occasional Associated Press story.

That's my beeper. Where's my board?

VENTURA, Calif. — When the surf calls nowadays, it just beeps.

About 430 dedicated windsurfers have bought into a paging service to get their attention at work or home when surf's up.

"A high percentage of windsurfers are professionals," said Dave DePaolo, a lawyer from Thousand Oaks. "We have busier schedules now and can't always clear out five-hour blocks of time to hang out and wait for the wind."

(Insert a little-known transcript from the O.J. Simpson trial — "I would like to request a two-hour recess, your honor. Surf's up," Prosecutor Marcia Clark exclaimed.

"Court will reconvene in two hours. I'll meet you there," Judge Lance Ito replied.)

The paging service, Call of the Wind, is the work of inventor and windsurfer Jim Martin.

One can see the beaches littered with briefcases and three-piece suits soon after "The Call of the Wind" is sounded.

Surfers pay about $210 for a pager and up to $21 a month for the service, depending on how many sites they want monitored.

I wonder if that $210 fee includes a replacement clause if you lose your pager in the surf?

I will soon be starting my own pager service called "Call of the Tuttle" to let those avid surfers and windsurfers know that the waves are peaking at a full three inches at Tuttle Creek Reservoir.

I don't have pent-up frustrations; I swear

LAKEWOOD, Colo. — A retired trash collector was arrested after stores in the Denver metropolitan area discovered scores of bras had been slashed.

Milton Anderson, 63, was arrested on suspicion of criminal mischief and cup-cutting and released on $500 bond.

The vandal damaged bras of all sizes, shapes and brands, always slashing only the right cup.

"There's some psychological significance, I'm sure," Lakewood police Sgt. Al Padilla said.

I think that's a pretty safe assumption, Sgt. Padilla. Going for that Ph.D. real soon, aren't ya?

Within hours of Anderson's arrest, however, women's slips, underpants and bras were discovered slashed at a Denver Kmart store. Investigators suspect a man who was arrested for stealing a book from the store.

Sources close to the case have been quoted as saying Anderson probably will get a life sentence of watching bra commercials, and instead of making license plates, he would be making bra underwires.

Several other area Kmart stores have been hit, including another store in this suburb where 365 bras were reported slashed in less than two weeks.

Is there a connection between the damaged right cups and Kmart stores? Right cup? Kmart? Right cup? Kmart?

Hmmmmmmm?

Just one more announcement

I, Smatterer X, have decided to get into the spirit of the season, (election season, that is) and announce my candidacy for student body president as a write-in candidate. My running mate is Tihsllub Folluf.

Here's a little background on your future monarchs.

I am a junior in master inscribing, and Tihsllub is a graduate student in inveracity.

Tihsllub and I are very familiar with the K-State campus and the ways of student government. We have been students for a combined effort of 18 years and have been trying to bribe student senators for many semesters to get our pork-laden bills passed.

We have decided to come forth and get active publicly because working behind closed doors did not produce results fast enough during our nine previous attempts.

Former Student Body President Ed Skoog never gave us credit for our ideas, such as the bass pond.

We were responsible for the "shot heard around campus," which was downed by then presidential candidate Jackie McClaskey.

Our platform is going to be about 10 feet by 12 feet, made of some nice treated redwood with a hot tub right smack dab in the middle.

We will be visiting student groups during the next few weeks starting with the Students for an Enlightening, Yet Cheap Education, SEYCE, and Students for Understanding Carnal Knowledge, SUCK.

Please bring your questions and donations. We accept cash, money orders, Visa and MasterCard.

Unchained melodies

Amateur performers croon karaoke tunes

"Bye, bye, Miss American Pie. I drove my Chevy to the levy, but the levy was dry."

The chorus to this popular singalong song echoed about the Flashback Lounge. The small crowd hollered for more while the singer's face blushed from the gleam of lights around the dance floor.

No, the crooner wasn't Don McLean, but rather an embarrassed singer vying for fleeting stardom with the help of a karaoke machine.

Karaoke is singing to the tune of songs, generally in front of crowds and without the help of a professional singer.

The song's words are provided, but the voice is left up to the brave soul behind the microphone.

"In karaoke, there are no such things as amateur singers. If we could sing, we would all have a different job," Jim Stein, Manhattan vacationer, said.

Stein was visiting Manhattan after living in Japan for more than three years.

The karaoke craze is extremely popular in Japan, Stein said.

"Every night in Japan they have karaoke going in small clubs like this one," Stein said, referring to the Flashback Lounge.

Stein said he has sung karaoke before more than 400 people at a wedding in Japan.

"Once after I got done singing, a guy in the crowd said, 'I used to like that song,'" Stein said.

Kay Runion, manager of the Flashback Lounge, has the karaoke machine available nightly.

She has had the karaoke system in place for three years.

"People are so scared to get up there, but I have never seen anyone not go back," Runion said.

People are afraid they will feel like horse's asses, Runion said.

Runion recalled a karaoke singer who was such a poor singer she paid him not to sing.

"His voice was like running nails over a chalkboard. People were leaving because he was so bad," Runion said.

Typically, the singers at the Flashback Lounge said they were not intimidated by the other people in the bar.

"It is a good time to come here with friends, act stupid and not be judged," Jennifer Hirschfield, sophomore in psychology, said.

Hirschfield admits to having no musical background, but said she would definitely sing karaoke again.

"Anyone can sing on it. They may not sound good, but they can do it," Hirschfield said.

Bobby T's Restaurant 'n' Bar also features karaoke.

The crowd went wild as a self-titled group, the Flint Ridge Boys, belted out the words to "Elvira," a song made popular by the Oak Ridge Boys in the 1980s.

"Did we kick butt, or what?" one of the group's singers yelled out to the crowd.

Ken Cone, member of the Flint Ridge Boys, said nobody is good, but it was fun to come out and make a fool out of himself.

Cone said he came to the bar with a group of 23 people.

It is more fun if accompanied by a big group of friends, Cone said.

Cheering for more beer and more tunes, the Flint Ridge Boys, sometimes as a group, sometimes taking the act solo, kept the karaoke machine busy all evening.

"It is hard to get up and do, but once you do, you just can't stop," Cone said.

Cone went on to sing "Unchained Melody" while the video and words to the song were displayed above the busy bar at Bobby T's.

The rambunctious crowd grew surprisingly quiet as the mellow song seemed to ease the bargoers into a romantic notion.

When the song was over, the crowd burst into applause while Cone accepted high-fives from his buddies. The crowd response was if he had just completed the national anthem at the Super Bowl.

"This is where you can have fun and bring some attention to yourself," Cone said.

Cone, a veteran karaoke singer, said almost everywhere he travels has karaoke at the clubs.

Brian McFarlane, graduate student in meat science, stepped up to the microphone at Bobby T's with a vengeance.

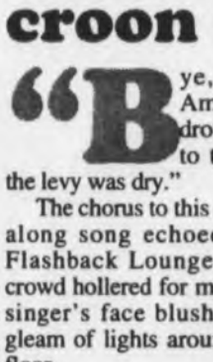
"Someone massacred my favorite song," he said.

To combat the botched attempt at "The Devil Went Down to Georgia," by a man identified as St. Pat, McFarlane sang "Don't Close Your Eyes" by the late Keith Whitley.

His girlfriend stood close to him as he sang the ballad.

"I'm going to do it again, but a different song," McFarlane said.

He said he was not embarrassed.



"I just looked at the words and did it," McFarlane said.

Bob Limbocker, manager of Bobby T's, said the karaoke crowd has gained more followers since the bar started featuring karaoke in 1992.

"Karaoke gets the crowd involved, and they have fun. Some singers come in and just do it for fun, and then there are some really great singers," Limbocker said.

Vegging out last week has you feeling laid back. It is important for you to take charge and get things done. A friend may blow up at you; just remain calm and things will be OK. Put romance on the back burner. For the weekend: Rest up.

LIBRA (SEPT. 24-OCT. 23)

Finances are almost in the clear — just continue to spend with caution. A person you've been interested in will show up on your doorstep from nowhere. The planetary alignments have you feeling especially spontaneous. For the weekend: Off to the nearest party.

SCORPIO (OCT. 24-NOV. 22)

You'll be energetic this week and in a great mood. Last week you took time out to relax — good thing, because this week has you running on empty. Romance becomes exciting as Venus enters your brother sign, Pisces. For the weekend: Follow the crowd.

SAGITTARIUS (NOV. 23-DEC.21)

This week you will seem drained and out of sorts, but don't be discouraged, because by mid-week a friend will have you flying high once again. Romance is still looking good as long as you remain independent. A good friend needs reinforcement, so be there. For the weekend: Out and about.

CAPRICORN (DEC. 22-JAN. 20)

Last week had you high as a kite, but now you feel unfocused and weak. A friend may come off as being rude, but you have been being extremely selfish lately. Romance might have you confused; just use your intuition. For the weekend: Be entertaining.

AQUARIUS (JAN. 21-FEB. 19)

Don't let your friends decide what's best for you. It's time for you to decide on your own. Romance might have you uneasy; just don't be so analytical. You'll be way ahead on all projects and work this week, so be prepared for lots of free time. For the weekend: Try something different and new.

PISCES (FEB. 20-MARCH 20)

Love, love and more love will be surrounding you this week. You'll be bombarded with romance and job opportunities, not to mention communications will be excellent. Because Venus has moved into your sign for a month, you will have a hyper attitude. For the weekend: Be a flirt.

Republicans' funding cuts won't hinder campus group

Hopefully, if I do not run, it will stop the CRN's terroristic attacks. I feel I can do more by not running again, but I'm not stepping down.

BILL SPADEA
National chairman of the College Republican National Committee

JANICE MELIA
Collegian

The loss of some funding from the Republican National Committee to the College Republican National Committee will not have a direct effect on K-State's College Republicans.

The RNC cut off about $120,000 to the CRNC, Mary Crawford, press secretary for RNC, said.

"It's because of our current leadership at the national level that the Republican National Committee has decided to cut out money; it's not against the group," said Becca Korphage, junior in political science and president of KSU College Republicans.

Bill Spadea is the national chairman of CRNC, and his two-year term will end this summer when the CRNC elects a new chair at its national convention.

"As soon as Bill Spadea resigns or they elect a new chairman, the funding will be back," said Greg Hill, 1994 graduate of K-State and 1993-94 chairman of Kansas Federation of College Republicans.

Spadea said he will not resign, but he will not run for the office again.

"Hopefully, if I do not run, it will stop the CRN's terroristic attacks. I feel I can do more by not running again, but I'm not stepping down," Spadea said.

Spadea said the terroristic attacks included the cutting of state funding as well as threatening the jobs of state chairs.

Hill said Spadea puts out a newsletter that is ultra-conservative that does not reflect the views of the Republican party.

Spadea said the ideas in the newspaper only reflect the same ideas that have been in the Republican party for the last 20 years.

The controversy simply shows the organization's desire for editorial control, denial of a battle within the Republican party and the spreading of the big-tent theory in the newspaper, he said.

Crawford said Spadea published some articles that were objectionable, including the call for a third party and running an advertisement that said Bill Clinton and former Presidents Jimmy Carter, Ronald Reagan and George Bush were all the same.

He said it was not appropriate for the RNC to continue giving the donations of hardworking citizens who had contributed their money to the Republican party to fund the CRNC.

"We are in the business of building and strengthening the Republican party and supporting Republican candidates," Crawford said.

Korphage said she sees things getting better within the next year. A state chair usually fills the position of national chair, and the current state chairs have good visions and goals, she said.

"I'm anticipating excellent leadership in the next year," she said.

But Spadea said he believes his term has been successful.

"We've recruited and communicated with more students in the past 19 months than in the last 20 years," he said.

In addition, because of all of the publicity, the advertising and subscriptions for the newspaper are way up, Spadea said.

"We're making a ton of money and have had more press than I could ever imagine," he said.

Spadea said advertisers and subscribers are not only hearing his viewpoint but contributing to it financially.

Hill said she agrees with Korphage and is looking for new leadership. The candidates have a different view than Spadea.

"They all seem fed up with the status quo. This chairman was in it for himself. I've talked to most of them, and most seem pretty sincere about it," he said.

Removing his name from the race has caused the other candidates problems in finding campaign plans because their plans had been based on bashing him, Spadea said.

In the meantime, the biggest problem with the split between the RNC and the CRNC is the damage that has been caused to the College Republicans' reputation, Korphage said.

"By the RNC distancing itself, it gives a negative connotation to us as a whole. It doesn't foster support, and it diminishes our respect on the national level," she said.

The RNC money did not have a direct role in the K-State chapter.

"The only way we see the money is by it filtering through the system," Korphage said.

Most of the chapter's money comes from fundraising, said Hermann Donnert, faculty adviser for KSU College Republicans.

The money the RNC pays to the CRNC usually goes to the state level of College Republi-cans and is used for many purposes.

Some of these include legislative actions, coordinating the national convention, administrative needs and distribution of information on both the state and national levels, Korphage said.

Large impact crater found

Geologists trace Mexican crater back to age of dinosaurs

MARK GOODWIN
Collegian

An asteroid 6-9 miles in diameter slammed into the Earth 65 million years ago and caused environmental changes, which may have led to the extinction of dinosaurs.

Christian Koeberl, from the Institute of Geochemistry at the University of Vienna, lectured Thursday night on the relationship between the Chicxulub structure and the Cretaceous/Tertiary boundary event 65 million years ago.

Koeberl said the Chicxulub crater is in the northwest tip of the Yucatan Peninsula in Mexico, with most of the crater on the ocean floor.

While the crater is not evident visually because sediment filled it in during the vast amount of time since impact, gravitational irregularities in the area tipped off geologists to its existence.

Koeberl said the Chicxulub crater is almost 190 miles in diameter, making it the largest that has been discovered on Earth. However, not all impact structures on Earth have been discovered.

Koeberl said a number of factors can make impact craters on Earth difficult or impossible to detect.

"Craters on Earth are subject to erosion, sediment filling in the crater and plate tectonics," Koeberl said.

"For example, almost two-thirds of the Earth's surface is under the ocean. Due to subduction, the maximum age of the ocean floor is 200 million years old, so we have to get to those craters fairly quickly to discover them."

Koeberl said geologists and planetary scientists now believe that the Chicxulub crater was the result of an asteroid impact that also led to the extinction of the dinosaurs.

He said rocks from the Chicxulub crater reveal shock characteristics indicative of an impact, and the age of meteoric material found at the site coincides with the time since the extinction of the dinosaurs.

He also said scientists believe a thin layer of soot is the result of plant material that was burned by the huge fireball such an impact would have created.

While large impacts on the Earth occur only every few hundred million years, Koeberl said small asteroids or comets measuring a couple of miles in diameter probably pelt the Earth about every 20,000 years.

James Underwood Jr., professor of geology, said Kansas has at least one known impact crater, which measures several miles in diameter. The crater, located in Kiowa County, was discovered in the 1890s to be the result of a meteorite collision.

"A woman named Liza Kimberly, who lived in the area, saw dark, black rocks on her property and the property of her neighbors," Underwood said. "She started collecting these rocks she called meteors, and everyone in the area thought she was crazy."

After five years, Kimberly contacted the University of Kansas to have someone examine the rocks. They were identified as a type of meteorite, and Kimberly was able to sell them for the then-large sum of $1,000.

▶ PERFORMING ARTS

Pianists to give interactive concert

ANDY BARLETT
Collegian

The renowned piano duo of James and Julie Rivers will perform at 7:30 Saturday night at the Columbian Theatre in Wamego.

The Rivers' Columbian concert is a special performance booked by the theater last spring as a part of its inaugural-year concert series.

"We're really excited to have them here," Linda Uthoff, artistic director of the Columbian, said. "The acoustics in the Columbian are so good, especially for jazz and classical music, and we have a lot of people that are really excited about seeing them perform here."

The concert will be a selection of classical music played on a pair of grand pianos. Featured in the show will be the work of nine classical composers, ranging from a pair of works by J. S. Bach to open the concert to an interpretation of Gershwin's "Porgy and Bess."

The Rivers duo hails from Topeka, and both have extensive musical backgrounds.

Uthoff said that the Rivers are a terrific duo.

She said a trademark of the Rivers' concerts is their interaction with the audience during the show. She said the pair really enjoys talking with the audience and will be personable between numbers.

James Rivers holds an appointment as the first pianist-in-resident in the history of Washburn University. In addition to being a published composer and recording artist, he has served on the executive board of several regional arts and civic agencies. Throughout his career, he has appeared with a variety of orchestras and performed at the Four Freedoms Awards honoring former president John F. Kennedy.

Uthoff said James Rivers does a terrific job and is one of the premier pianists in the state of Kansas if not in the entire Midwest.

Julie Rivers has an equally extensive musical background. She has taught at three different schools, including the University of North Texas, and has established piano studios in Kansas and Texas.

In 1992, she won several awards for music-writing at the 26th Biennial Composition Contest of the National League of American Pen Women.

Julie Rivers is also an established recording artist and will release a new compact disc later this spring.

FOR TICKETS

Reserved tickets for the concert are available for $8 at the Columbian box office. Further ticket information is available at the theater, 521 Lincoln Ave. in Wamego, or by calling 1-800-899-1893.

Candidates suggest uses for fund

Starting college scholarships for Manhattan residents was the issue that came up the most.

"I would like to see projects or services that enhance the tie between the University and the community, and I don't believe that scholarships are an appropriate application of that," Snead said.

Horne also said he does not approve of the use of the fund for scholarships. He said it would be intangible and a difficult thing to do.

On the other hand, Kastner said he believes creating scholarships is a good way to use some of the money and also draw students to the University and Manhattan.

"I think that the scholarship program is a logical fit for Manhattan. At face value, that looks like we're supporting only Manhattan residents, but the key thing to remember is this: By having some of this money ear-marked for Manhattan residents, we free up other money for people from St. John's, for people from Nebraska and from Topeka, Kansas, for scholarships," Kastner said.

Kastner and Hall said added lighting, expanded escort services and alternatives to parking were other suggestions.

Hall said the idea of connecting Farrell Library to the Manhattan Public Library had been raised, and to do that would require safety and parking to be addressed.

Candidates were asked whether they supported the creation of some form of public transportation, such as a shuttle bus, that would serve both the city and campus.

Hall said he is not opposed to creating such a system, but he sees potential problems in the funding.

"In order to be able to fund such a system, you have to do one of three things: You're either going to have to raise taxes or cut some existing services in order to pay for it," Hall said.

"Or, what you're going to have to do is to try to get KSU, USD 383, the city and the county governments to sit down and agree that it is a priority of theirs, an interest of theirs and to contribute funds to it," he said.

Kastner, Snead and Horne all said user fees would be necessary for any type of transportation system that was developed.

Accessing the needs of the community to see if a system is needed also was important, they said.

Kastner compared K-State with the University of Kansas campus in terms of need for a shuttle service.

He said it takes students at the University of Kansas about 20 minutes to walk between classes, but at K-State, the walk does not warrant a shuttle.

Voter registration of K-State students was another topic brought up by an audience member. Candidates were asked how they would decrease voter apathy.

All said they believe voting is important, especially for students.

Snead suggested following the Motor-Voter laws and said it is the county's responsibility to assist the city in encouraging students to vote.

Horne echoed Snead's opinion that the county is responsible for holding elections.

"The county clerk is the county election officer. The city does not have that function, and neither does the school board or any other organization. The county clerk is the person in charge of registration," Horne said.

"It is more a function of the students and student groups as to how they want to encourage the county clerk to put out more places of voter registration," he said.

Lecturer says education is in age of transition

Today, the same educational issues that have faced public-policy makers and educational leaders since World War II — access, quality and productivity, are still important, Connick said.

"Each has become much more complex, and the solutions for the 21st century will require some major wrenching change for all of our educational institutions," he said.

All three public-policy issues can be addressed with the same tools that businesses have been using — basic telecommunication tools and personal computers.

He said education is the only occupation that remains fundamentally labor-intensive.

"One of our major problems is that we continue to do our planning and evaluations on the studying of past trends," he said. "We don't do enough about what is going to be needed in the next century."

He said the five issues facing policy makers in the next century will be education funding, the purpose of education, the infrastructure of education, the products of education and the organization of education.

"Public-policy issues always revolve around two things, who pays and whose hands are on the steering wheel," he said.

"In the minds of many, the people are not willing to pay and maybe not even as much as they do currently, and the hands of the educators seem to be slipping off the steering wheel."

Connick said education is in an age of transition, and many questions are being raised about the opportunities and vision of education.

He said one of the deep concerns about the use of technology in education is what is going to happen to school campuses.

"We need to be careful to remember that we are in the education business, not the campus business," he said.

"Education is learning knowledge, information, skills, abilities and personal development, but it does not have to happen at any certain place."

Connick said he was not suggesting current campuses are going to close but that the question is how to serve those who want an education but that cannot attend a campus.

"Technology and telecommunication seem to offer enormous potential as part of the solution," he said. "What we are seeing created before our eyes is a new culture."

Once behind curtain, pick a winner

Dear Cassie,
This may sound strange, but how does one vote? I have registered but don't know how to do the actual voting. What does one do once behind the curtain?
Signed, Clueless

Dear Clueless,
You will be given a clipboard with a metallic cover that slides down, containing the ballot inside. It will have a list of all the candidates with circles beside each name.

Once behind the curtain, you will fill in the circles of the people who you want in office. You'll pull down the metallic cover to cover your ballot.

When you walk out of the booth, the person outside will place the clipboard over a box with a slot in it. They'll tap the top of the clipboard, releasing the ballot into a locked box.

The ballots will be tallied up later.

Acclaimed film shows prison life

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Collegian

If you never got around to seeing "The Shawshank Redemption" on the big screen, this weekend is your last chance.

Shawshank was the unconventional, little-seen, critically acclaimed movie recently considered the dark horse for the Best Picture Oscar.

Critically acclaimed might be an understatement. Shawshank, a movie about prison life, was one of the best movies to hit the screen this past year.

MOVIE
"The Shawshank Redemption" will be at 7 and 9:30 p.m. Saturday at Union Forum Hall

It was definitely underappreciated by audiences. That can be attributed mainly to little advertising and a small release.

Morgan Freeman plays the philosophical Red, a man sentenced to life in Shawshank State Prison in Maine for murder. Red is the man in prison who gets things for others: a pack of cigarettes, nudie playing cards or chewing gum. He spouts wisdom and offers seasoned advice to his prison friends.

It isn't until a man named Andy Dufresne, played by Tim Robbins, comes to Shawshank that Red and his pals realize the finer and more important things in life.

Andy is a wrongly convicted banker, mistakenly accused of murdering his wife and her lover. He's exposed to corruption and beatings on the part of the staff, rapes between prisoners and cruel solitary confinement.

But, out of all this torture and unhappiness, Andy guides his friends and himself to a brighter existence. He refines the prison library and helps fellow inmates get their high-school equivalency diplomas.

Being a banker, Andy even files the prison staff's tax returns and consults on financial issues.

However, this ideal situation can't last. It never does.

Frank Darabont, who wrote the screenplay, which was based on a short story by Stephen King, and directed the film, has crafted a harrowing prison tale.

The first half of the movie, which deals with the inhumanities of Shawshank prison, is absolutely horrifying. You keep asking what else could possibly get worse. How on earth could it end happily?

Darabont gives us the best of both worlds. Shawshank is at first a grimy, dark prison story of survival and second, a hope-filled, feel-good story of triumph.

Freeman, who was nominated for a Best Actor Oscar (and who probably deserved it), is in top form as the soulful Red. It's the perfect part for the slow-to-speak, intelligent Freeman, an expressionistic actor who always says something worthwhile or nothing at all.

Indigo Girls' KU performance sold out

PAGE GETZ
Collegian

Lawrence's Lied Center will witness the equivalent of a folk powwow when the Indigo Girls consume an otherwise typically untypical Saturday night on Massachusetts Street.

The sold-out concert, which is sponsored by the University of Kansas Student Union Activities, will begin at 8 p.m.

The Indigo Girls, consisting of Emily Saliers and Amy Ray, weave their voices into a harmonized brew of both social consciousness and acoustic bliss that creates a sound unmistakably their own.

"They've got a lot of energy. They're very acoustical, very raw," John Danos, Goodnow Hall director, said.

Danos saw the duo live at a free concert at Grinelle College in Iowa, which was attended by about 500 people.

"I really like their lyrics," he said. "They're very poignant and real, and it's refreshing to see artists that are up front about their sexual orientation."

"Swamp Ophelia" is the duo's sixth tour together. The sound has a more layered and undefinable sound to it.

Other Indigo Girls releases available on Epic records are "Rites of Passage," "Back on the Bus," "Y'all," "Nomads + Indians + Saints," "Strange Fire" and their self-titled debut.

Carrie Ambler, junior in horticulture, is one of the few Manhattanites who got tickets.

"I'm really excited about it. I got third-row seats," she said. "I love the way their voices blend together. They're awesome."

"Swamp Ophelia" takes their music into an almost psychedelic lullaby in the surreal and chilling "Touch Me Fall," while they continue their tradition of more self-aware love songs and John Bradshaw meets Peter, Paul and Mary style.

The music has a soulful and earthy passion, infiltrating an undefinable folk with a touch of twang at times.

Its raw femininity and consciousness are woven into an underlying element of self-actualization that has drawn in a great following.

Swedestock lets bands jam for free

STEPHANIE SWISHER
Collegian

Attention, musicians. Tune up your instruments and bust out the sunglasses. It's time to jam.

On April 21, Bethany College in Lindsborg will be the scene for the third annual Swedestock open-air band festival.

Swedestock is an opportunity for bands to perform and gain some exposure, said Cindy Baldwin, director of Student Activities at Bethany College.

"Basically, it's a chance for bands to get their names out to the public," she said.

If musicians are interested in playing at Swedestock, it's not too late to register. Entries are being taken through the beginning of next week, Baldwin said.

"There is no registration fee, and we pay the mileage, feed the bands, and they get a free T-shirt," Baldwin said.

If interested in performing at Swedestock, bands can call Baldwin at (913) 227-3311 ext. 8162.

"We're selecting the best five bands, and final band selection is next week," she said. "We just ask for an audition tape and any other promotional material the band might have."

Four to five local and regional bands will be selected to perform, she said.

There will be 45-minute sets starting at 3 p.m., and two stages will be run, so there is not a big lag time, Baldwin said.

"The original idea was to have a day with a fun experience that would also expose people to a wide variety of music as well as making us think about the world and our place in it," Baldwin said.

Live music won't be the only entertainment at Swedestock.

Various booths with everything from tye-dye, beads, hairbraiding and tattoos will be set up, Baldwin said.

Swedestock has been an ongoing tradition in Lindsborg, Kan.

"It's a fun event that involves the whole school and community, and it would be great to have more people from out of town come," Michael Chambers, senior at Bethany, said.

Show among oldest student activities

Tara Loy, sophomore in animal science and industry, showed cattle for nine years as a 4-H member before coming to K-State.

"I miss it," she said. "Living up here, away from my animals, is hard, and I can't go home very much because I work a lot on weekends."

The participants spend a lot of time working with the animals, training them and getting them ready to show.

The LAR originated in 1924 as an exhibition and parade of University livestock in 1928. It evolved into a fitting and showing contest for students.

Block and Bridle and the Dairy Science Club organize the event each year. The show will begin at 1 p.m. in Weber arena. At 2:30 p.m., there will be a celebrity milking contest followed by the championship drive.

A grand and reserve champion showman will be selected for each of the five species, and the first-place team will be announced.

Dennis Wilson, director of jazz studies at K-State, said he is excited about the event.

"The CJE has been working hard and building all year," he said. "The band's hot. It's going to be smoking."

Wasted Potential, another Manhattan area group, will also be performing at the festival, Berquist said.

The festival is open to the public. Tickets can be purchased in advance for $8 at the McCain ticket office or for $10.50 at the door the night of the event.

The festival is co-sponsored by the New Currents Jazz and New Age Appreciation Club, UPC Eclectic Entertainment and Lucky BrewGrille.

"The New Currents Jazz Club is a jazz, new-age fusion club aimed to help educate people about jazz music," Berquist said.

"It's more of a listening club," he said. "We usually get together at someone's house and listen to music."

If individuals are interested in the New Currents Jazz Club, they can get more information by calling Tim Lindemuth at 532-6260.

Parades, games, projects to enhance Saturday's open house festivities

Casino Day is a big part of the day for students in the College of Business Administration. They will also be displaying available computer technology in their newly updated computer lab.

Technology can also be discussed in the newly completed multimedia center for the College of Education. Activities will include media applications and computer games that show changes that have been occurring in education.

On Saturday, the College of Engineering will have a parade displaying floats from each of the departments and perform skits in front of Seaton Hall.

There will also be student projects on display both days. On Saturday, visitors may view computer-controlled robots and participate in a banquet provided by the College of Engineering at the conclusion of Open House.

Students in human ecology will be providing food samples produced in Kansas, ice-carving demonstrations, a mock family-therapy session, diet-counseling session and viewings of award-winning projects.

The College of Veterinary Medicine will be providing some exciting activities with a children's petting zoo, tours of the veterinary medicine complex and a variety of speaker presentations.

TIPS FOR WRITING A CLASSIFIED AD

Always put what item or service you are advertising first. This helps potential buyers find what they are looking for.

Don't use abbreviations. Many buyers are confused by abbreviations.

Consider including the price. This tells buyers if they are looking at something in their price range.

CATEGORIES

To help you find what you are looking for, the classified ads have been arranged by category and sub-category. All categories are marked by one of the large images, and sub-categories are preceded by a number designation.

There'll be your favorite country western tunes and lots of hootin' and hollerin'. So y'all come on down to the Rec Plex for a rip roarin', aerobic-shoe-scootin' good time. Hope-ta-see-y'all-thar, KICKIN' AT KSU!

Pool Action

Running and swimming are both excellent aerobic exercise. Dr. Jane Katz compares the two in her book, Swimming for Total Fitness. Champion runners go one mile in about four minutes, champion swimmers would cover a mile in about 4 times as long, or sixteen minutes. The training effect is similar if your skill level is the same for swimming and running. Swimming a half mile is comparable to running two miles. Swimming also has its advantages. There are fewer injuries and pains and less danger of overheating when swimming. Additionally, swimming results in smooth, firm, elongated muscles.

The pool is a great place to workout and recreate. Check the calendar for water exercise sessions and pool times.

Who's Who at Rec Services

Amy Suhr, native of Omaha, Nebraska, has worked for Recreational Services for almost two years. Suhr, senior in english, said life guarding at the Natatorium gives her a chance to meet a lot of people. "The people I work with are great," she said. Her interest in becoming a lifeguard can be attributed to her use of the Natatorium during her first two years of school. "I swam at the Natatorium before I became a lifeguard and that is how I found out about the job," Suhr said. She still finds time to exercise at the Natatorium at least five times a week. She will graduate this May, and her plan is to get into a graduate program. "I would like to stay in a university setting in order to go to graduate school shortly after I complete my undergraduate degree," Suhr said.

Rob Kooser, native of Derby, Kansas, has worked as a building manager for Recreational Services for three years. Kooser, senior in kinesiology, said a building manager has a lot of responsibility. "I handle any emergency situations or problems with customers, employees, or other people at the Rec Complex," he said. He enjoys the camaraderie he has found while working at the Rec. "I enjoy working together with other individuals to see a goal accomplished," Kooser said. Upon graduation this May, Kooser has an internship in Wichita. Kooser said he feels that the expansion and the health trend of the 90's will bring even more people to the Rec Complex in the future.

My Favorite Workout

Nancy Bolsen, director of adult student services, started using the Rec Complex when it was built in 1980. " I got one of the first lockers there," she said. Almost 15 years later, she is still using the facility four or five times a week. Bolsen uses the track for walking and said she really likes the cardiovascular equipment. She is also looking forward to using the new weight room as soon as it is completed. Bolsen said the Rec Complex is a complete facility. "You can't go anywhere in Manhattan and find a better facility for a better deal," she said. Bolsen said she feels very fortunate to have a facility like the Rec Complex at K-State. "It's a hidden treasure," she said.

Successful Weight Loss

1. AVOID RAPID WEIGHT LOSS: To assure weight loss is from body fat and not lean tissue, do not exceed two pounds of weight loss per week.
2. TAKE IN ENOUGH CALORIES: Men should consume at least 1,500 calories daily, while women should eat around 1,200 calories each day.
3. EXERCISE IN MODERATION: Take part in thirty to sixty minutes of aerobic exercise no less than three days per week. The exercise level should be in the range of 60 to 75 percent of your target heart rate. For maximum benefit, combine aerobic activities with an additional strength training program three to four days per week.
4. CONSISTENT AND PERSISTENT: Maintain a regular lifelong regimen of exercise and a balanced diet.

CONSTRUCTION UPDATE

Progress continues with the goal of completion in sight. Many comments such as "wow," "super," "more than I expected," etc are being heard. The new entrance opened and the administrative offices and service areas moved during spring break. Demolition for converting the old office area to a stretching area and entrance to the new track has begun. Also new restrooms and the resource area are being converted from the old service area. The new weight and fitness area should open in May. Finish work on the track and the west part of the mall area will continue into June. The "old" gym is now undergoing renovation with new lights, acoustical ceiling, and floor resurfacing. Intramural softball has begun "under the lights" for the first time at Kansas State.

Fitness Facts

Muscles do matter. After just two months of moderate strength training, you'll increase your muscle mass enough to burn up to 1,050 extra calories per week. Muscles burn calories like car cylinders burn fuel. (Bryant & Peterson, Weekly Planner & Training Dairy, 1995)

Student commits suicide at Tuttle

SARAH LUNDAY
Collegian

John Gaieski, 19-year-old freshman in engineering, was found dead at Tuttle Creek Reservoir about 8 a.m. Friday by tree trimmers working in the River Pond area.

"Evidence at the scene leads us to believe it was a self-inflicted gunshot wound to the head," said Gerald Schmidt, Pottawatomie County Sheriff's Department investigator.

The fourth-floor resident of Goodnow Hall drove to a boat ramp parking lot below the dam late Thursday night or early Friday morning. He took with him a full-size shotgun he bought legally in Manhattan several days prior, Schmidt said.

A note found at the scene indicates Gaieski had been contemplating committing suicide for some time, he said.

Donna Gaieski, John's mother, said the short note left at the scene said he did not want anyone to blame themselves.

Gaieski said there were a number of things that influenced her son's decision.

"We can piece it together, but we can't come up with one reason," she said.

Many students showed up at the all-hall informational meeting Friday night on fourth-floor Goodnow.

Because of the large press coverage Ross Taton's death received earlier this semester and their feelings for Gaieski, floor residents decided not to allow strangers on to the floor, canceling all fourth-floor open house tours on Saturday.

Also, the media are only allowed in the first-floor lobby, Shah Hasan, assistant director of housing and dining, said.

"They just felt it would be easier for them if there weren't any strangers," Hasan said.

The students of Goodnow Hall are discussing the possibility of a memorial service, but plans have not been confirmed, John Danos, Goodnow Hall director, said.

Gaieski was athletic, well-liked

SARAH LUNDAY
Collegian

Goodnow Hall resident John Gaieski was found dead about 8 a.m. Friday at Tuttle Creek Reservoir with a self-inflicted shotgun wound to the head.

The red-haired, athletic freshman in engineering was known as a friendly guy and was well-loved by friends and family.

"John was a really outgoing guy and really well-liked by the floor," Aaron Austin, junior in music, said.

Gaieski was known for playing a lot of pool with his fourth-floor Goodnow Hall friends and for being a fairly athletic person, Austin said.

"A real fun-loving kind of guy," he said.

In high school, Gaieski was Olathe East High School's No. 1 tennis player, Principal Karl Krawitz said.

Among other activities and honors, Gaieski was a National Honor Society member for two years, won a 1993 state mathematics award and was named a Kansas Honor Scholar.

Krawitz said Gaieski was just a really well-liked individual.

"John was a tremendous kid," he said.

Donna Gaieski, John's mother, said her son enjoyed being outdoors, listening to music, physical fitness and had recently become active in karate at K-State.

"John was always looking for new challenges in physical fitness," she said.

And, although Gaieski was majoring in engineering, he was thinking about changing to psychology.

"He had recently said he was enjoying psychology so much, he was thinking about changing," Gaieski said.

When asked to describe her son, Gaieski said her son never felt he was anything special.

"He was special in that he was bright and thoughtful, but he never believed in himself as much as his friends and family believed in him," she said.

Gaieski is survived by his parents, John and Donna Gaieski, and a 17-year-old sister, Julie Gaieski, a junior at Olathe East.

Gaieski was a 1994 graduate of Olathe East and came to K-State in August 1994.

Taton's death still under investigation

SARAH LUNDAY
Collegian

The stabbing of Goodnow Hall resident Ross Taton, junior in engineering, sent homicide and suicide speculations running across campus on Jan. 10.

Riley County Police, Kansas Bureau of Investigation and the K-State Police worked together to gather pieces of evidence concerning Taton's death.

Today, the KBI is still processing the clues found in Taton's first-floor room, Robert Mellgren, captain of the K-State Police, said.

"We've been waiting for it to come in any time," Mellgren said.

Taton

A bloody knife, untampered-with locks and lack of motive eventually led investigators to conclude Taton's death was self-induced.

"All indications lead us to believe it was a self-inflicted wound," Mellgren said.

Several other prominent events have caused evidence from Taton's case to be pushed to the back of KBI's rush list.

"It's not a priority one," Mellgren said concerning the Taton investigation.

In January, Goodnow Hall residents responded to Taton's death with meetings and counseling support for all students.

Faces that gave support and grieved for Taton gathered again at hall meetings Friday night that were called to help Goodnow students deal with the suicide of John Gaieski, freshman in engineering — the second death this semester within the hall community.

"Having support from other people is really needed," Sheryl Benton, psychologist for University Counseling Services, said to students gathered in the fourth-floor lobby Friday night.

Ghost living in fraternity makes television debut

MIKE HILL
Collegian

Lights, camera and action were the some of the words heard at the Pi Kappa Phi house on Saturday as the United Paramount Network filmed a TV special, titled "Real Ghosts."

The TV show will be an hour-long special with one-half of the program on the ghost of Duncan that is said to haunt the Pi Kapp house and the other half about a ghost in a bar in Kentucky.

Craig Anderson, location director for UPN, said the legend of Duncan makes for a great story.

"There have been so many weird stories on how he died and what people have seen in this house that we felt it would fit in to what we were looking for," he said.

Anderson said the filming consists of people talking about what they have experienced in the house.

"We're going to conduct five or six interviews and probably use a bit of all of them in the show," he said.

Although the filming was going slow, and it took many tries to get one shot right, Anderson said the Pi Kapps were good to work with.

"It's fantastic working with these guys. They're so helpful and accommodating," he said.

Larry Keller, senior in marketing, said acting is harder than he thought.

"I don't know if I'd want to do it for a living," he said.

Open House visitors take advantage of the weather to check out what K-State has to offer

COBY HESS
Collegian

Saturday's warm spring weather helped make K-State's Open House a great chance for visitors to check out what the K-State campus is all about.

The day's schedule included activities, tours, exhibits and contests all day throughout campus.

"We walked over to the veterinary building and saw a cow with a hole in one of its stomachs, and it was still alive," Erik Pierron from Easton said.

Visitors had a chance to witness a huge variety of demonstrations, including everything from music ensembles at Union Station to glass-blowing demonstrations by master glass blower Mitsugi Ohno at King Hall.

Other activities and demonstrations were conducted by the engineering department at Durland Hall.

"We saw some robots sumo wrestling and the egg-dropping contest, which was pretty cool," Jordan Toot of Easton said.

Campus living facilities were also open to visitors, and tours were given at all of the residence halls for incoming freshmen and their families.

Many campus-wide volunteers were on hand to help direct people and answer questions.

"K-State's campus has got a real friendly sense to it, and there are lots of people around to answer questions and help you out with whatever you need," said Brad Montgomery, from Cheylin High School in McDonald.

Pat Sawyer, a K-State alumna from Kingman, said the K-State campus is very friendly, and the people here are very helpful compared with those at KU.

"K-State is much more specifically helpful than KU's campus, and the people here are honest," she said.

Eric Marsh, from Olathe North High School, said he came to K-State's Open House to check out the school of agriculture.

"After today, I'm pretty sure I'm coming to K-State to study something in agriculture. I really enjoyed visiting this campus, and all of the people here are very helpful," he said.

Derek Stone of Merriam said he is thinking about transferring to K-State from Pittsburg State.

"Pitt State's campus is too small for me, so I wanted to come to K-State to check out the business department. So far, everything seems very cool," he said.

Alyssa Armour, K-State alumna and Manhattan resident, said there are so many activities happening on campus that it's hard to take them all in.

"You don't realize how many activities and events there are to be involved with, especially while you are taking classes," she said.

Monica Schaeffer of Atchison High School said there is no doubt she will be coming to K-State next fall.

"I like K-State's campus,. It has a nice atmosphere and except for the construction is very pretty," she said.

▶ NETWORK ALLOWS SUBSCRIBERS TO VOICE EDUCATION COMPLAINTS

Opponents to cuts in funding for higher education can voice their opinion on their own e-mail list.

The list is called Campus Activists' Network, Educational Rights. It was started to give the growing campus movement an outlet to protest the attacks on higher education and specifically on financial aid.

The e-mail list was set up by groups working to stop the proposed Contract with America.

The list is being loaned to Student Aid Action, US Pirg, USSA and other groups to organize national action. The list was used to organize last Wednesday's National Day of Campus Action Against the Contract With America.

To prevent excess e-mail volume, the list is screened by Sarah Lund of Student Action Coalition at Kent State.

CAN-ER has about 500 subscribers. Anyone interested in protesting the Contract with America can subscribe to the list and can cancel at any time.

▶ RANCH OWNER MAY FACE JAIL IF NEW HOMES NOT FOUND FOR 45 DOGS

The Pet Hotline Ranch still needs to find homes for approximately 45 dogs by April 10.

John Lang, Pottawatomie County attorney, said if the dogs are not gone by then, Beverly Hashagen, director of the Pet Hotline Ranch, will have to surrender herself to the sheriff.

Hashagen appeared in court Tuesday.

"The judge ordered the dogs, other than her own, off the premises," Lang said.

Hashagen housed about 150 dogs before getting in trouble with the Pottawatomie County Zoning Administration.

She has reduced her dog population considerably since then.

Hashagen was found in contempt of court for not complying with her conditional-use permit. Hashagen said the conditional-use permit was to allow her to keep the dogs on her land.

HOTLINE

Anyone interested in adopting a pet should call Pet Hotline Ranch at (913) 456-2592 or (913) 494-8415

She had an agreement with the zoning administration, which would allow it to evaluate the situation if the dog population exceeded 50.

Hashagen has seven acres of fenced land for the dogs. She said many of the dogs on her land were found stray. Some of them show up pregnant, and she takes them in and cares for the puppies.

Hashagen said she has many good dogs that need homes. She said she is taking things one day at a time.

"What I'm mainly concerned about is getting the rest of the dogs out," Hashagen said.

"We're looking for foster homes, as well," she said.

Hashagen is asking a $10 adoption fee for the dogs.

Hashagen said she would like to continue the other services the Pet Hotline Ranch offers.

Those services range from animal-cruelty investigation to tracing lost pets.

▶ KU STUDENT WINS TRUMAN SCHOLARSHIP; 4 K-STATE STUDENTS FINALISTS

Kansas' Truman Scholarship was awarded to a University of Kansas student this month.

Sherman Reeves, a former Manhattan resident, was awarded the scholarship based on leadership skills and public service.

He said he plans to finish his final year at KU and attend medical school, where he can combine public policy and health policy.

Four K-State students were finalists: Liz Ring, junior in history; Jennifer Arnett, senior in political science and Spanish; Jocelyn Viterna, senior in sociology and Latin American studies; and Dan Lewerenz, senior in philosophy and American ethnic studies.

Lewerenz said more than 700 students were nominated for the scholarship nationwide, and only about 100 students make it to the final interview process.

"Most candidates who receive interviews put in between 60 and 100 hours of work on their application," he said. "I know all the K-State people put in that much time."

An important part of the application was a policy proposal development and defense, which took a lot of time, Lewerenz said.

"There's so many good people here at K-State that it's a honor just to be nominated by the school," Lewerenz said.

Ring said she looks at her loss of the scholarship as a gain.

"I don't feel like I got cheated out of anything. I feel I gained a lot," she said. "If K-State nominated me again, I'd love to do it again."

Ring said she was challenged in the interview process and Truman interviews is unlike any other.

"Now since I've had the experience, I walk into interviews with high confidence," she said.

The Truman Scholarship is awarded annually to one student in each of the 50 states. Winners receive a $30,000 scholarship for four years of study leading to a career in public service.

JAZZ FESTIVAL ROCKS HOUSE

MIKE HILL
Collegian

The Wareham Opera House was rocking Saturday night as the New Currents Jazz/New Age/Fusion Club put on its fifth annual Jazz Festival.

The festival opened with the KSU Concert Jazz Ensemble, which played for a little more than an hour. It ended its performance with what the director, Dennis Wilson, said is a great K-State football game song titled "The Band is Hot."

Manhattan's own Wasted Potential took the stage next and played for more than an hour. The crowd obviously appreciated the performance, with many audience members giving a standing ovation at the end.

It was then time for the headliner of the night, David Basse and the City Light Orchestra.

Basse said he is originally from San Jose but has lived in Kansas City for some time.

"I moved to Kansas City in 1974 because of the music and heritage of Kansas City," he said.

Basse said he has played all kinds of music but started playing jazz in 1982.

"In August of '82, the group came together at the City Light Restaurant in Kansas City. The first night we played there, we got a great response, so the owner asked us if we wanted to play there all the time, and we said yeah," Basse said.

The City Light Orchestra never looked back after that night and have now played all over the world, Basse said.

"We played at the largest department store in the world in London for three days," he said.

Basse said the band plays a style of music it calls Kansas City jazz.

"When I say Kansas City music, I mean that it is music for dancing and very blues-based," he said.

Basse said the band plays about 60 percent original music with the original stuff more on the rock or pop side of jazz.

"In the last few years, we have fashioned our music around the horn section like the bands Chicago or Blood, Sweat and Tears," Basse said.

The crowd of around 130 people was a little smaller than the City Light Orchestra was used to, but Basse said they have played to smaller audiences.

"We've played as big as 200,000 people and as small as nobody," he said.

Basse and the City Light Orchestra got the audience at the Wareham into the music right away with a powerful three-man horn section, a piano, a bass player and two sets of drums.

Basse played one set of drums while he sang in a deep blues tone that got people to their feet and dancing by the third song.

A highlight of the show was when the pianist, Mike Melvoin, played a solo, and the horn section went out to the back of the audience and played solos beside those in attendance.

The power of each horn solo brought many people to their feet, but when Basse came in on an incredible drum solo, the crowd literally jumped out of their seats.

Bryce Berquist, president of the New Currents Jazz/New Age/Fusion Club and senior in management, said he was pleased with the festival.

"This blows away everything else we've ever done," he said.

Leo Walsh, senior in anthropology, said Manhattan needs more events of similar caliber.

"We definitely need more events like this. Jazz is really big," Walsh said.

Walsh said he liked the music of the City Light Orchestra but could do without the vocals.

"I really liked the first two songs with the City Light Orchestra, but I really don't like David Basse singing," he said.

Roe v. Wade lawyer coming to K-State

SARA SMITH
Collegian

Women's History Month is officially over, but one of the most famous female lawyers in America is coming to K-State.

Sarah Weddington, the lawyer who argued the winning side of Roe v. Wade before the U.S. Supreme Court, will speak at 7 p.m. Tuesday in McCain Auditorium.

Her speech will focus on the abortion issue as it relates to privacy and how women can become involved in leadership positions in government and politics, said Pat Carney, chairman of the Union Program Council Issues and Ideas Committee.

"It is basically a well-rounded message for everyone," Carney said.

Carney said although Women's History Month officially ended at the end of March, Weddington wasn't able to come to K-State until this week because she has such a hectic schedule.

"She is basically the featured speaker for the month," Carney said.

Christy Drake, chair of the UPC Special Events Committee, said Weddington should draw a large and varied crowd to McCain.

"I think it will be a wide mix of people," she said.

Drake said she expected a lot of men to attend the lecture because of the amount of attention Roe v. Wade has received since 1973.

Although people might be tired of hearing about the abortion controversy, Weddington played a large role in the legalization of abortion, Drake said.

Weddington, who is now a teacher, writer and lecturer, served in the Texas state legislature and was an assistant to President Jimmy Carter from 1978 to 1981. During that time, she worked with the White House effort to promote the ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment.

Carney said he thought Weddington had something to offer both men and women.

"Some women would think that only women should attend, but she's been so involved in government and politics, I think it conveys a message for everyone," he said.

Public aid changed little

ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — In the nearly a year since Kansas and Missouri lawmakers passed the most far-reaching welfare reforms in the states' histories, little change is evident in the public-aid systems.

For example, in Missouri, there are no self-sufficiency pacts, which was to be the state's method of encouraging welfare recipients to find work.

In particular, a Kansas City pilot project called 21st Century Communities has been a near bust. After nearly seven months, only seven workers remain on the job under a much-heralded reform program.

Eighteen others originally chosen for the city's plan have quit their new jobs or been fired. A state official says the main obstacles have been finding people who are ready to get off welfare and work, and persuading employers to hire them.

"It's been painfully slow and difficult," said Gary Stangler, director of the Missouri Department of Social Services. "People in Congress think it's a snap to reform welfare, but out here in the real world, it's a lot more complex."

"So far, so-called welfare reform hasn't reformed anything," said Kansas Sen. Gus Bogina, a sponsor of the state's reform package.

General Public $18 Senior Citizen $16 Student $9

Join the lively, bawdy pilgrims on the local vicarage lawn for the finals of the annual Geoffrey Chaucer Storytelling Competition. Tales are told of love, lust and laughter. Some are traditional and visual; others are, in the funniest and most good humored way, a little less delicate. The New Vic's raunchy and rambunctious rendering is not perhaps one for purists, but is definitely one that would have Chaucer rolling in the aisles.

"Are they like Monty Python? Kind of, but not as cerebral. Are they more Benny Hill? No, their work is intellectually conceived but equallly crazed. . . .They are simply the best theatrical comedy group in the world today." (Bill Royston, The Philadelphia Inquirer)

Sinking or swimming — which are you doing?

All the pressures of life can pile up on you. Classes, graduation, job-hunting, relationships or dealing with the loss of a friend or loved one can take their toll.

Not everyone is a good swimmer. Sometimes you can just get tired. All you need is a break from constantly trying to stay afloat.

There are life preservers and lifeboats out there to help you. The only catch is you have to seek them out; they can't always find you to offer assistance.

Talk to your roommate(s), housemom, resident assistant, significant other or friends. Call or visit University Counseling Services in Lafene Health Center 232. Call the FONE Crisis Center. Call or visit the Pawnee Mental Health Services at 2001 Claflin Road. Victims of rape or sexual assault can call the Women's Center.

Look up Counseling Service, Crisis Intervention Service, Mental Health Centers, Mental Health Services, Psychologists or Psychotherapists in the Yellow Pages for more options and specific possibilities.

Finding causes, reasons for homosexuality not as important as learning to accept it

KEVYN JACOBS

Why is it so important to figure out why I am gay, anyway?

Why this obsession with finding out the cause of homosexual attraction?

Unfortunately, it's not just intellectual curiosity. If it were, we'd probably see about the same interest in the causes of homosexuality as we see in finding out the cause of left-handedness. (Left-handed behavior is, of course, a deviant behavior pattern that occurs in around 10 percent of the population.)

Gender roles ("The way men and women are supposed to behave") are politically charged issues in our culture. And sexual orientation issues are especially charged, because they involve the way men and women relate to each other sexually.

Religious groups, convinced that their sacred texts are literal truth and that these texts condemn homosexual behavior, are anxious to prove that homosexuality is a sinful choice.

Some even suggest that homosexuality is an "illness" that must be cured and have set out to find proof to back up their beliefs. Their curative efforts proceed from this presumption, which most mental health experts say is invalid.

This is very bad reasoning on the religious groups' parts, especially when most of the data seems to be in conflict with their preconceptions.

The gay political movement is so interested in finding a biological cause for homosexual attraction simply because many gays feel a need to justify their sexual orientation as not being a matter of choice. This is the "I was born gay" argument.

Whole research projects have been set up on this very premise, to find evidence that supports the biological causality of homosexuality.

This, too, is very bad science. You can't make a conclusion, and then try to make your data fit the conclusion. Science doesn't work that way — you are supposed to make a hypothesis first, gather the data, and then draw your conclusions. If you are not willing to change your hypothesis to fit the data, in the end you are going to have to contort the data in all sorts of bizarre ways to make it fit, which both sides have done on occasion at the expense of their scientific credibility.

Not that either side can be blamed for trying to shore up their beliefs with data. There is a political and ideological war going on over the issue of sexual orientation, and facts make great weapons.

Yes, there is a growing body of evidence that says homosexuality has a biological root. But to be honest, I question how objective the gatherers of that evidence were. What political agenda were they following?

In the end, I suspect that objective studies of homosexuality will not be fully possible until the ideological war is over. Until then, skepticism is the name of the game. All research is suspect.

But what if a biological cause is found for homosexuality? What then? Will a search for a cure be the next logical step? Will a test be devised to determine if a fetus is homosexual?

This very question was addressed a couple of years ago in an off-Broadway play called "Twilight of the Golds." In the show, a pregnant woman is given a new test that determines what the sexual orientation of her baby will be, even before it is born. In this particular case, the test comes back and says the child she is carrying will be homosexual.

The play then revolves around the woman agonizing over the decision to abort the homosexual child or to bring it into the world.

This is, of course, a topic that gay people have speculated about from time to time. What happens if a biological cause that can be tested for is found? Will it lead to widespread acceptance for homosexuality?

Or will it lead to a medical holocaust for gay people?

The question certainly gives me pause. Especially since I am someone who believes it is acceptable for a mother to kill a fetus she is carrying.

Perhaps we are asking the wrong question about homosexuality. Perhaps we shouldn't be asking, "What causes homosexuality?"

Instead, perhaps we should be asking, "Why should sexual orientation matter at all?"

Adoption the best alternative for parents with unwanted children

KATHLEEN MASTIO

Recently, I have had a few opportunities to watch television, and I have been amazed by what I have seen.

Two of the shows I have watched were about adoption and how the system takes advantage of poor, unsuspecting mothers. Unfortunately, this portrayal could not be farther from the truth.

For most, adoption is the most beautiful choice. A living, breathing child is placed in a caring and loving home of the mother's choosing.

Babies are no longer snatched away from mothers' arms and given to total strangers. Children are transferred from one parent to another, with warmth and compassion.

Adoption hasn't been praised in this country as the perfect option that provides the most care and support for both mother and child. It allows mothers to think long and hard about their choices. They can even discuss, with a well-trained counselor, all of their options.

Adoption, if done correctly, is the choice that offers the most peace; now and in the future. It allows a child to grow up knowing he or she is loved by parents who are able to care for him or her.

Women are allowed to choose the families that will adopt their children. Mothers are able to pick a multitude of characteristics about the baby's future family. Meetings are possible, and in most cases, enjoyed by all involved.

It is important for people to understand how adoption really works. It is a healing process that does a lot of good for many women.

That doesn't mean women don't suffer and grieve because of their loss, but it doesn't mean a permanent nightmare for them.

It is learning to move on and allowing others to do for a child what some mothers are unable to do.

There is no one on Earth most mothers care about more than their children. Wanting what is best for them is only natural. Adoption for many young or incapable mothers is a blessing from above.

They have cared for their child enough to bring them into this world and have made a truly selfless decision to allow another family to raise him or her. Despite their desire to raise the child themselves, they choose more able parents.

Adoption allows women to move away from a mistake in their past without guilt or fear.

The most unfortunate part of adoption is disgrace — there is more social shame involved with placing a child for adoption than there is with an abortion.

That doesn't mean women don't suffer and grieve because of their loss, but it doesn't mean a permanent nightmare for them.

Adoption requires that women take responsibility for their actions and make the best of bad situations. Abortion is an escape, a door to run out, a way to hide.

No one looks to be 17, living in poverty and pregnant. Adoption may be the hard choice at first, but it won't haunt a woman forever.

Let adoption be what it is: a blessing and a gift from God. Let it be God's way of fixing what has been done wrong in the past. It's almost a way to redeem the past.

Adoption is nothing short of a miracle.

For those women who have chosen life, I salute that choice and the courage it took to make it.

A special thank you from all of those who have adopted children and had a family.

Birth mothers have made a world of dreams possible for some families, and not enough can be said to thank them.

Kathleen Mastio is a sophomore in pre-veterinary medicine.

Candidates want student needs answered

Editor's note: This is the first of a five-column series written by the student body presidential and vice presidential candidates. It is meant to give the candidates an opportunity to share their concerns and platforms in-depth. The columns will run daily in the order that the candidates will appear on the ballots.

SCOTT PHILLIPS

PAT CARNEY

In understanding our candidacy for the positions of student body president and vice president, it is essential to understand the themes and issues that run throughout our campaign. The themes that many will see will reoccur throughout the campaign: First, that the student body needs to be re-energized to take their student government back. Second, that leadership is action and not position. Third, that if you do not want to lead or follow, then in addressing the problems of students at K-State, you need to get the hell out of the way.

When we announced in early March, Scott Phillips was dressed in an Elvis costume. The reason behind the costume was because we believe that the voice of the students in student government is as dead as Elvis. Over at least the last year, the input from students has been largely nonexistent or ignored by many within student government and wish to change that. One only needs to look as far as the recent parking garage proposal to understand that the student voice was ignored. While letter after letter was rolling into the Collegian in opposition to this plan by students, ranking student leaders in student government, both the executive and legislative side, continued to support the proposal.

In the first section of our platform, named Reach Out, we have proposed the creation of a legislative initiative program that would utilize the Student Senate Election Committee to run the student referendums on large projects which would change the face of the campus or cause a significant increase in fees, user or otherwise. Furthermore, we want to restructure the the committee system in student government to allow students who want to participate in their student government to do so, and eliminate the ridiculous limits that create a selections process and only allow a privileged few to become interns or at-large members.

While opening student government up and making it more accessible to the students is a top priority, we also believe that the second theme of our campaign, leadership is action and not position, is an essential feature that has been missing from our student government. When Scott Phillips said during our announcement party that student government has been lethargic, it is because it seemed that many students believe that all that happened in SGA was a lot of meaningless debate about internal issues, and they are right. Over the past year in Student Senate, nearly two-thirds of the debate time was spent on Constitutional, By-Laws or Standing Rules Debate. Furthermore, if it was was not internal matters being debated, the parliamentary procedures were being used to slow the entire system down even further. We believe that student leadership has to be proactive and not reactive, and that is why we created our platform and have even created a legislative program that will be forwarded immediately after the elections.

First, we are committed to our Saferide Program, so much so that we will dedicate the entire two salaries of these two offices so that they can be implemented no later than spring of 1996.

The students need a student government that does not sit around waiting for issues to come to them. For this reason, our platform has addressed several other key areas. First, we are committed to our Saferide Program, so much so that we will dedicate the entire two salaries of these two offices so that they can be implemented no later than spring of 1996. This program will provide free transportation to students from bars and the Aggieville area with the assistance of the Riley County Police, Aggieville Merchants and a national grant based out of Gainesville, Fla. We believe that with the rising number of student DUIs, this program will serve all the students and those who don't because it seeks to lower the number of DUIs students receive and lowers the number of intoxicated student drivers that are out on the roads, making it safer for everyone.

STUDENT ELECTIONS '95

Next, our Parking Concerns section not only opposes any parking garage that students would have to pay for through direct and user fees, but also seeks to declassify parking to making all classroom parking accessible to everyone and eliminate the 7 a.m. to 5 p.m. or 24-hour reserved lot so we can see how many spaces can be utilized and how serious this parking problem is on our campus.

Finally, our Community/City Involvement section would actively pursue an open communications between the city and government to ensure that student input on future sales tax increases is heard. Furthermore, we would use this contact to attempt to build a shuttle transportation both on campus and in the community, so some of the long-term parking and campus safety problems can be addressed, while using the resources of the city along with the University.

In outlining our platform, we hope that we can send home the message of our campaign. As student body president and vice president, we believe that student government has to be of the students and it has to be involved in action and not in political positioning. So the final point to our campaign comes down to our final theme and that is "Lead... Follow... Or Get The Hell Out Of The Way." We want everyone to become involved, but if anyone who is involved in student government does not wish to address the needs of the students, then they certainly have no place on student government.

We are committed to change, and that change is an active partnership with the student body, which has been absent for some time. Many of you believe change is good ... so, let's do it.

Dean deserves an apology

Dear editor,

In last Monday's edition of the Collegian, you quoted me as stating that Dean Hollen (dean of the College of Education) has refused to pay for Open House. I made this statement in Senate, but the statement was inaccurate. I would like to take this opportunity to publicly apologize to Dean Hollen for the statement of misinformation. I hope my error hasn't caused the dean or the College of Education any embarrassment. I would also like to apologize to the Student Senate for the statement. I was trying to hurry my debate and I mixed my facts up.

"I would like to take this opportunity to publicly apologize to Dean Hollen for the statement of misinformation.

LIVESTOCK ON PARADE

A bit of Kansas City graced Weber Arena on Saturday.

Story by Shelly Fogle Photos by Steve Hebert

The 67th annual Little American Royal took place Saturday afternoon in Weber Arena. More than 100 K-State students were loaned a beef or dairy heifer, lamb, hog or horse to be shown in the competition.

The Little American Royal, a miniature version of the American Royal in Kansas City, Mo., celebrated its 67th year with more than 100 participants.

The LAR is a huge tradition at K-State, and it has a lot of alumni support, said Chris Mullinix, junior in animal sciences and industry.

Mullinix, president of the LAR executive council, said the show gives students an opportunity to work with and understand the livestock industry.

"I had never shown before, but I had been around cattle. I wanted to learn how to show," said Mariah Berry, sophomore in animal sciences and industry and pre-veterinary medicine.

The competition, based on the ability to show off the contestant rather than the animal's qualities, is open to any K-State student regardless of major.

The show gives people who don't know anything about livestock some knowledge about the animals, said LaRae Brown, junior in animal sciences and industry.

Brown, third-year veteran of the LAR swine show, said she enjoys the challenge of showing the animal.

"It is nice to be around the animals since I can't be at home on the farm," she said.

To prepare her show pig for competition, Brown said she walked the animal around and let it get used to her presence.

"Showing does not hurt the animal in any way. It makes them tamer and easier to handle," Brown said.

She said the key to showing pigs is to keep an eye on the animal, an eye on the judge and to act like you are having fun even if the animal is not cooperating.

Contestants competed for prize plaques in beef, dairy, horse, sheep and swine divisions. The top two showers in each division received plaques.

T.L. Meyer, freshman in animal sciences and industry, was the grand champion in the horse division.

Meyer, newcomer to the LAR, said she was nervous before showing the horse.

"I just wanted to look like I knew what I was doing," she said.

Meyer and her partner, Jenny Hodgson, freshman in agricultural business, spent time during the past two weeks getting the horse ready for show day.

Meyer said Hodgson bathed the horse and worked to get the mane to lay down.

Rosemary Smith, horse division judge, said although she made a judgment, all of the participants were winners.

All contestants were required to work with their assigned animal prior to the show, Mullinix said.

Lynn Kennedy, junior in animal sciences and industry, said she did not expect to win the reserve grand champion prize for showing a dairy heifer.

"I won second place in my class, and I thought the first-place winner in my class would win the overall competition," Kennedy said.

The show's contestants entered and showed animals in small classes. The first- and second-place winners of each class were then eligible to show again for the grand and reserve grand champion honors.

Matt Nelson, senior in pre-veterinary medicine, said he sheared, washed and led his show sheep before competition.

Nelson, grand champion winner in the sheep division, said he thought the LAR was a good way to showcase local talent.

"It teaches you about winning, losing and having fun," he said.

In addition to awards for show ability, herdsmanship awards were earned by students having a special dedication to the LAR and the animals they cared for.

The show was sponsored by Block & Bridle and Dairy Science Club.

Players end strike; owners vote against lockout

ASSOCIATED PRESS

CHICAGO — The longest and costliest work stoppage in the history of professional sports ended Sunday night when baseball owners accepted the union's offer to play without an agreement.

The season, which had been scheduled to start Sunday night, will begin April 26, and each team will play 144 games, 18 fewer than the usual.

"Anyone who has gone through this eight-month experience will let it serve as a poignant reminder that we have a responsibility to make sure it will never happen again, certainly in our lifetime," acting commissioner Bud Selig said after a 4-1/2-hour meeting.

Players may report voluntarily starting Wednesday to training camps in Florida and Arizona, although some were expected to start trickling in today. The mandatory reporting date is Friday.

The strike wiped out the final 52 days and 669 games of the 1994 season and forced the cancellation of the World Series for the first time since 1904. It also wiped out the first 252 games of this season, raising the total of games lost to 921.

"It was not a surrender. The players were on strike," Selig said, "They made an unconditional offer to come back, and we accepted that offer."

However, the owners did not obtain a no-strike promise from the union, leaving open the possibility that players could walk out again late this season if owners again threaten to impose a salary cap.

"I think it's clearly a step in the right direction," union head Donald Fehr said. "If they had voted for a lockout, it would have been a clear indication they didn't want peace — at any price."

Asked why the union wouldn't give the owners a no-strike pledge, Fehr said the sides agreed such a promise, at this time, would raise legal complications for players and owners.

President Clinton, who failed two months ago in a personal effort to end the strike, said: "Today's decision is good news for the game of baseball, its fans and the local economies of the cities where baseball is played.

"While I am heartened to know this season will start with major league players, there are a number of underlying issues which still need to get resolved."

The sides still must work toward a deal that would replace the collective bargaining agreement that expired on Dec. 31, 1993. Players, who walked out last Aug. 12, ended the strike Friday — the 232nd day — after U.S. District Judge Sonia Sotomayor issued an injunction forcing owners to continue the work rules of the expired agreement.

"The clubs hope that the 1995 season — including the postseason — will be played without interruption," Selig said. "We hope our fans never again have to go through the heartache we've endured the last eight months."

Baseball's eighth work stoppage since 1972 was caused by the owners' demand for a salary cap. They tried to impose it last Dec. 22, but withdrew it on Feb. 6 after the National Labor Relations Board threatened legal action. When teams refused to restore the old rules, the NLRB filed a complaint on March 15 and then obtained the injunction.

Owners still hoped to have the injunction dissolved and Sotomayor's decision reversed.

A hearing is scheduled Tuesday before the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals on the owners' motion for a stay of the injunction and an expedited appeal.

Netters drop match to Oklahoma State

BRIAN THOMAS
Collegian

K-State tennis coach Steve Bietau was by no means pleased with his team's performance Sunday.

The Wildcats dropped an 8-1 Big Eight Conference decision to the No. 43 Oklahoma State Cowgirls at the L.P. Washburn Tennis Complex.

With the loss, the Cats fell to 7-7 overall and 1-1 in conference play.

Bietau said he was not expecting the performance he got from his team.

"I thought we would do better," Bietau said.

"Especially since Oklahoma State was without their top player, Kym Hazzard. It was a poorly played tennis match. I really thought it was poor on both sides."

Even without Hazzard, the nation's No. 82-ranked singles player, the Cowgirls had no problem putting away the Cats.

K-State managed only one victory the entire day against OSU.

In No. 1 singles, all-America Karina Kuregian, No. 26 in the country, extended her personal winning streak to eight matches with an easy 6-1, 6-2 win against Kelly Press.

Kuregian improved her singles record to 22-5.

The Wildcats dropped two hard-fought, three-set matches in singles.

Karen Nicholson fell short in a 6-2, 1-6, 6-4 loss to Tasmin Wainwright.

In No. 3 singles, Dinah Watson took the opening set but could not finish off Jacqui Gunthrop in a 0-6, 7-5, 6-3 loss. In doubles, the team of Kuregian and Martine Shrubsole, ranked No. 17, snapped a 10-match win streak with a 6-4, 6-1 loss to Press/Gunthrop.

"They didn't make very good decisions," Bietau said. "Martine's range isn't very far on the court. That forces Karina to go that much harder. She overplayed at times during the match."

Bietau said there were few bright spots for either side.

"Karina played well for us," Bietau said.

"Carolina Hadad did OK for them in singles. Otherwise, there wasn't a good level of emotion or intensity from anybody."

The Wildcats continue Big Eight action today as they face the Oklahoma Sooners. Play is scheduled for 10 a.m. at the L.P. Washburn Tennis Complex.

Rookies get experience during K-State Open

WESS HUDELSON
Collegian

K-State gave some athletes the weekend off while others took advantage of good weather to gain experience.

Half of the team did not compete at the KSU Open Saturday at R.V. Christian Track.

"I think we got a lot out of it, for those who competed," Assistant coach Jill Lancaster said. "The weather was great, and there was some good marks."

Lancaster said the road trip to Texas during spring break had some of athletes tired. K-State competed at the College Station Relays at Texas A&M March 17 and the Southwest Texas Dual March 24.

"After the two meets in Texas, we have some people who needed a break," Lancaster said. "We have a tough string of meets ahead with the Texas Relays, the Kansas Relays and the Drake Relays."

Kirsten Schultz captured two first-place finishes in the shot put and the javelin with marks of 42 feet 2-3/4 inches and 156'6".

Kristen Schultz finished second to her sister in the shot put with a heave of 40'1/4" and third in the javelin with a toss 150'5".

Travis Livingston won his second-straight race Saturday in the 110-meter hurdles with a time of 14.21 seconds. Livingston set his personal best at the Southwest Texas Invitational.

"This is the first time we've had Travis full-time," Lancaster said. "He got a lot of work in this fall, and it's starting to pay off."

Livingston was a member of the K-State football team in 1993.

The athletes who didn't make the trip to Texas were getting their first taste of competition this season, Lancaster said.

"I think a lot of the teams approached this meet the same way we did," Lancaster said.

"All of them had some athletes who hadn't competed yet and some who were a little tired from the indoor season."

Aaron Larsen competed for the first time since having elbow surgery. Larson finished second in the javelin with a throw of 217'4".

Larsen finished second to former Wildcat Dennis Nelson, who was competing unattached.

K-State travels to Austin, Texas, for the Texas Relays Friday and Saturday.

UConn beats Tennessee, finishes undefeated

MINNEAPOLIS, Minn. — With its final victory in a magical season, Connecticut achieved something rare in NCAA women's basketball — perfection.

UConn 70
Tenn. 64

Top-ranked Connecticut capped an unbeaten season by defeating No. 3 Tennessee 70-64 Sunday to win the national championship.

The Huskies (35-0) pulled it off despite the foul problems of their top three players and despite trailing by nine points early in the second half.

Only one other team has gotten through a season without losing in the 14 years of NCAA women's basketball.

Texas won the 1986 title with a 34-0 record.

Defense also was critical to the Huskies, who kept Tennessee (34-3) without a field goal after Tiffani Johnson's three-point play put the Lady Vols ahead 61-59 with 4:09 left.

Jamelle Elliott hit a double-pump layup to tie the score at 61 with 2:20 to play, and Jennifer Rizzotti's layup with 1:53 to play put Connecticut ahead 63-61.

The Huskies then wrapped up their first national title at the free-throw line, with Player of the Year Rebecca Lobo making four and Rizzotti and Carla Berube sinking two apiece.

Lobo led all scorers with 17 points after playing only eight minutes in the first half.

Lobo was also named the Final Four's outstanding player. Rizzotti scored 15 points, Elliott 13 and Wolters 10.

Latina Davis was Tennessee's only double-figure scorer with 11 points.

Dana Johnson had nine, and All-American Nikki McCray scored only seven.

Cats take 1 of 3 from Cyclones in Ames

NICOLE POELL
Collegian

At least the weekend wasn't a total loss.

The K-State baseball team salvaged one win during its three-game weekend series against Iowa State, defeating the Cyclones 14-10 in the second game of Saturday's doubleheader. The Cats lost the opener by a score of 6-5 and suffered a 10-3 loss in Sunday's contest.

Despite a solid pitching performance from Eric Yanz in the first game, K-State missed some early opportunities to get on the board.

The Cyclones struck early, scoring two first-inning runs, and then added three more in the third on a three-run homer from Troy Logan.

But K-State got back into the action in the fourth inning and scored two runs when Chris Bouchard walked, Dave Hendrix doubled and Heath Schesser grounded out. The Cats closed the gap a little more in the sixth with a walk to Scott Poepard, who scored on a two-out single from Adam Green.

The Cats cut the margin to 6-4 in the seventh with a single from Chris Hess, a stolen base, an error and a sacrifice fly from Todd Fereday. Although K-State came within one run in the ninth on a Tim Decker solo home run, it was too little, too late.

The second game of the day saw the Cats claw their way back from an early 8-3 deficit to pull off the 14-10 victory in the 11th inning.

A seven-run sixth inning, highlighted by a grand-slam homer from Poepard, propelled the Cats to a 10-8 lead. But the Cyclones came back to knot the game at 10-10, forcing the game into extra innings.

The Cats didn't give up. Schesser came through with a one-out, two-run single, and Decker tripled to seal the win for K-State.

Larry Walty recorded the win for the Cats, pitching 6-2/3 innings of two-hit, two-run relief before Jon Albrecht came on in the 11th to get the save.

Although K-State went into Sunday's contest looking to pick up its 14th win of the season, Iowa State held the Cats scoreless until the ninth to tally the 10-3 victory.

The Cyclones jumped ahead by three in the first on Logan's second three-run homer of the series. Iowa State almost had the shutout until the Cats' Kevin McMullin, Mike Gardner and Ryan Buell scored in the last inning. Taking the loss for K-State was Jack Witt, who moves to 0-1 on the year.

K-State, now 13-11 overall and 2-6 in the Big Eight Conference, looks to get back in the win column in Tuesday night's home game against the Oklahoma Sooners. Game time is set for 7 p.m.

Rebirth of spring brought to stage in annual dance

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Collegian

The K-State dance department's annual SpringDance officially sprung this weekend.

Weeks of hard work and dedication by a multitude of K-State students, not necessarily dance students, brought a good, if not bumpy, show to life Friday and Saturday night in McCain Auditorium.

The show itself acted as a metaphor for spring, starting out cold and a little discomforting but ending in a bang of color and action. It's just that the color and action took a little longer to arrive than your mother's tulips.

Keith Banks, the alumni guest choreographer and owner and director of Studio 10 Dance in San Jose, Calif., presented the only truly upbeat, feel-good dance of the evening.

The other seven dances, with the exception of choreographer Luke Kahlich's "Still of the Night" danced to music sung by Aaron Neville, were mostly nightmarish, mind-numbing urban fantasies practically devoid of spirit and life.

Banks' "Saxtime" was a funny, don't-take-yourself-so-seriously ensemble dance resembling a drill-team dance number, except for the spotty unison.

The only complaint you could possibly register is that it was too short. If you're going to bring an alumni guest choreographer to K-State, at least give him (or make him) give us a dance of more than a few minutes.

The show started promisingly enough, with Kahlich's "Groupus Magnus" danced to music by Paul Simon. It wasn't flashy, but the fun the dancers were having with it was evident in their performance.

Kahlich's second piece, "Temple Caves," began quite stiffly, but once dancers Holly Clement, Steve Hoekstra and Kelley Scott fell to the floor, the dance became much more fluid and expressionistic.

Dancer and choreographer Nabeeha Kazi's "Spiritual Evenement" was an excellent showcase for Kazi's remarkable talent but might have worked better as a solo piece.

Last year's SpringDance featured a gorgeous solo by Haley Hoss that swept the audience off its feet. That never happened Friday night.

SpringDance '94, which was far more successful than this year's entry, varied itself with solo pieces, ballet and modern dance. SpringDance '95 lacked variety. Modern dance was used extensively in the show, leaving no room for ballet or, God forbid, tap.

Achmed Valk's morose "Humble Narcissus/Passionate Zen" was interesting, to say the least. What it lacked in courageous movement and excitement, it more than made up for in visual profundity.

The dancers' shadows cast upon the architectural pieces by Robert Arens multiplied the effects on stage, adding an eerie ghostliness to some of the choreographed moves. The use of Robert Maplethorpe's flower photographs was effective, not as a reactive piece for the dancers, but as a visual piece to divert the audience.

Vera Orlock's piece, "3 Tangos," offered another dance with strong visual effect, but it was most notable for Orlock's excellent performance dancing the tango. It was a romantic piece, full of sentimentalism and thankfully lacking the self-importance of many of the evening's darker pieces.

Although the choreography and overall vision of SpringDance was lacking, the dancers performed to their credit. Coming from different backgrounds and majors, the dancers of SpringDance were more interesting than the show in which they were dancing.

Schools seek accreditation under new rules

Program focuses on student results, application of skills

MARY EMERSON
Collegian

The Quality Performance Accreditation program has caused confusion over exactly what it is.

QPA is a state program that has been designed to assess the ability of a school to teach its students.

"The simplest way to say it is that it is an accreditation program based on student results," said Clark Reinke, associate superintendent for Site Support Services for Manhattan-Ogden USD 383.

Basing the accreditation on student performance is a big difference from the traditional method of assessment.

"In the past, they've based it on inputs, like the number of books in the library and certification of the teachers," he said.

Manhattan High, Bluemont and Lee schools are the three schools in USD 383 that are pilots for the program. These schools are in the fourth year and will be reviewed soon by the state to see if they can gain accreditation.

Beginning QPA was not difficult for USD 383 because it was already running an advancement program, and only small modifications needed to be made, said Debbie Nuss, candidate for USD 383 school board.

Reinke said this is the first year a school in Kansas is eligible for accreditation and the rest of the area schools will be part of the complete cycle next year.

Under QPA, students are still being graded on the traditional school subjects such as reading, writing and math, but also on cooperation, behavior and test-taking skills.

"We are asking them to demonstrate that they've learned and apply that knowledge," Reinke said.

QPA tries to mix traditional academics with learning skills.

It does this by giving students worksheets and reading assignments. After the material is completed, the students are given a test. If they pass, the class goes on, but if not, the same lesson begins again, said Colleen Hampton, associate scientist in the agronomy department and candidate for USD 383 school board.

Some say this does have foreseeable problems.

"That's not the way it works in the real world. It's slowing down the brighter kids to teach the slower ones," Hampton said.

The added worksheets create more paperwork for teachers. This leaves less time for teachers to prepare for class, she said.

Assessment itself can pose another problem.

"As a teacher, I can see the day-to-day progress. I can hear a student talk about a concept that he understands, but then miss a question on it on a true/false test. How do you judge that?" Reinke said.

This is why the state suggests that schools build a pyramid of other ways they can show what the child is learning, Reinke said.

Some believe that QPA is not a good indicator of academic progress.

"My daughter has a report card that has 37 attitudes and behaviors and how she displays those during class," Hampton said. "The closest to any academics on it is 'writes effectively' and 'reads effectively.'"

Fear that the program is watering down education is unwarranted, Reinke said.

He said that QPA gives parents a better idea of how their child is doing.

"Take for example writing. What does a C mean? With the program, parents get a portfolio of the child's writing and can see what skills the children are learning," Reinke said.

Most are supportive of the program but say they would like to see changes made.

"Accrediting schools on the basis of their performance is better than on the basis of the number of books they have, but it needs some radical modification," Larry Weaver, USD 383 school board candidate, said.

Weaver was the only candidate to state specific changes he would like to see made. He suggests change in two areas.

First, stressing the importance of things like cooperation is important, but grading it is impossible. Grades should be saved for academics, Weaver said.

Second, the explanation of QPA needs to be in plain English with examples so that teachers know exactly how the program should work, he said.

With or without modification, the program is part of the education system, according to state law.

"Change is always hard. QPA is our nudge to get into assessment," Reinke said.

"When you're declaring that you'll be judged on the results, it holds you accountable."

Brownback supports student loans

BRIAN HEIAR
Collegian

Rep. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., said he was in favor of the government having some involvement in student loans Saturday morning at the Manhattan Town Center.

The Manhattan Chamber of Commerce sponsored a discussion in the Manhattan Town Center food court Saturday morning.

Brownback said it is important for the government to support students because they are the future of our nation.

He also said rather than the government giving loans directly to the students, loans should be given out through the banking system.

Brownback said the actual dollar amounts would have to be reviewed before the government can decide when the interest should start to accrue on the loans.

Brownback said the bureaucracy in Washington should be cut. He said the government should cut out some of the ineffectual departments such as the commerce department, education department and the energy department.

Brownback

He said the government should get back to more of its core functions.

Brownback discussed the Contract with America. He said the 10 bills that were supposed to be finished within the first 100 days will be done ahead of schedule in only 93 days.

Brownback said he supports term limits for members of Congress. He said Kansas stands to lose some from term limits in Congress because of the seniority of Kansas legislators like Sens. Bob Dole, R-Kan., and Nancy Kassebaum, R-Kan.

He said the Legislature as a whole could benefit from the new blood and new ideas coming into Congress. Brownback also said incumbent legislators have too much of an advantage.

Brownback said a balanced budget is the biggest battle in Congress right now.

"If we fail, we are going to leave a bigger mortgage for our children," Brownback said.

He said Congress has to reverse the wedge in budget cuts. He said the government should make the big cuts early and work toward smaller reductions, rather than the other way around.

He also discussed the school-lunch program in the United States. He said Congress has actually approved more money for the school-lunch program than President Clinton asked for, but it wants the states to handle the program.

This is one way the states will have more control and is an example of how the government can get closer to the people, Brownback said.

Brownback was preceded in the forum by speakers Rep. Sheila Hochhauser, D-Manhattan, Rep. Kent Glasscock, R-Manhattan, and Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan.

Oleen said the state Senate had completed negotiations on public education and the education budget had been increased.

Glasscock and Hochhauser both discussed the state lottery. The state lottery is scheduled to end in 1996 unless extended by the Legislature.

Glasscock said the lottery was having some problems passing because legalized slot machines are in the package with it.

He said the bill should be amended to take slot machines out of it.

Hochhauser said the lottery is important to the state, and the proponents of the slots would allow the slot machines to be taken out of the bill once they realize it is the only way to pass the lottery.

Candidates express concern about business park site

COLLEGIAN STAFF

The city commission candidates met for the final time at a forum Saturday afternoon.

The planning of a new $14-million business park was one of the key issues. The proposed site for the business park is east of Manhattan airport.

Candidates Lex Pearson, Ed Horne and Justin Kastner said the site should be considered because there were no perfect locations for the park.

"The city would be insane to choose the site until they are absolutely sure it's not in a 100-year or a 500-year floodplain," Steve Hall, candidate, said.

Bruce Snead, candidate, said the site of is not in the 100-year floodplain.

Flood occurrences at certain sites over time are determined by the Federal Emergency Manhattan Agency.

FEMA does not have the proposed business park site in the 100-year plain.

"I think there should be a public referendum on the business park before we would vote in favor of it," Hall said.

The candidates were asked if the economic-development tax should be used to establish neighborhood associations and improve neighborhoods.

Kastner said the city needs to listen to the expertise of the economic-development board. Horne, Snead and Pearson said they agreed with Kastner.

Hall said he felt differently about the issue. He said the city should spend some of the money on infrastructure and provide some quality, affordable housing.

Snowstorm kills 5 soldiers in Bosnia

ASSOCIATED PRESS

SARAJEVO, Bosnia-Herzegovina — One of Bosnia's heaviest spring snowstorms in decades hampered both peacekeepers and warring armies Friday and killed five soldiers who froze after being stranded on a mountain road.

After a two-day search, British peacekeepers rescued 66 other people from the road in central Bosnia. Five days of snow have made mountain roads there and in northeast Bosnia virtually impassable.

In northwest Bosnia, artillery shells smashed into the U.N.-protected safe area of Bihac, badly damaging a water pipeline, the United Nations said Friday. Bosnian radio said several civilians were injured but gave no details.

The British peacekeepers had been looking for a convoy of officers and soldiers from the Bosnian Croat militia and Croatian army who were stranded while returning from a meeting with government army commanders in Travnik.

Maj. Herve Gourmelon, a U.N. spokesman, said the peacekeepers rescued 11 men from the convoy and found five men frozen to death. The top militia commander, Tihomir Blaskic, and the commander-in-chief of the Croatian army, Gen. Janko Bobetko, were reported safe. Fifty-five other people were also rescued.

Last year, under heavy U.S. pressure, Bosnia's Muslims and Croats formed a federation, but they are still uneasy allies in the three-year war against Bosnian Serbs, who control 70 percent of the republic's territory.

The Serbs began a counteroffensive Wednesday in the mountains near Travnik, hoping to reverse substantial government gains over the previous week.

Dear Cassie,
I know you don't play matchmaker, but I just read the letter from "No Name," and I would love to meet him. I, too, am sincere and caring and yet seem to get hurt all the time. So please help me meet him.
Signed, Help

Dear Help,
Hello? Is my name Chuck Woolery? Do you see Love Connection printed below my name? No!

Honestly, I would love to help you, but one of the many reasons why I can't is because I don't have his name and have no idea who he is. The other has to do with some messy legality business.

But if you and "No Name" would like to get together, I suggest you place a personal ad giving a date and place.

'Showtime at the Apollo' gets crowd into act

LUKE WEHRMAN
Collegian

Crowd participation was the name of the game at K-State's first "Showtime at the Apollo," presented by the Ebony Theatre Co.

Jeneena D. LaShelle Hubbard, senior in theater and director of the Ebony Theatre Co., organized the event, which took place Saturday night at the Union Little Theatre.

"It involves crowd participation," Hubbard said. "You're the judge, and you get what you pay for."

Hubbard said the acts are judged by audience reaction.

"If you like the act, you clap, if you don't, you boo them," she said.

A clown by the name of Sand Man removes groups that are booed off the stage.

Hubbard organized the event because she wanted something different.

"We did it because I wanted something fresh and new," Hubbard said.

Hubbard said "Showtime at the Apollo," which started in New York City, has helped many entertainers get their start.

Hubbard said it took some time getting the production organized, but it wasn't hard getting students involved in this first production.

"It took a lot of reaching out, but people got excited about it," she said.

Hubbard said she had many students calling her and expressing their interest in getting involved.

"I had seen some of them at talent shows," Hubbard said. "I kind of recruited them."

Hubbard said there was a rehearsal Friday night to pick the other performers.

A total of 16 groups performed in "Showtime at the Apollo."

The performances ranged from poetry-reading to singing and dancing.

E.B. "Big Will" Williamson, junior in accounting and finance, was the master of ceremonies. He provided comic relief between performances.

Williamson said he thought the turnout was good.

"I think next year we'll be able to hold it in McCain or Forum Hall," he said.

Prizes were awarded to the top three groups.

First prize was $100, second was $40, and third was $30.

The group 911 walked away with first prize.

It had the audience going wild as the group of four sang a song by Black Street.

Marcus Cooper, freshman in social work, took third prize. He performed a gospel song.

"I had a good time," Cooper said. "I didn't even know there was money involved."

The audience seemed to enjoy the show.

"I thought it was great," Michelle Bennett, sophomore in interior design, said. "I think we should do it every year."

Hubbard said the Ebony Theatre Co. has two main performances a year. It also performs at various other events when asked.

"It was organized because it was an outlet for students of color to showcase talents," she said. "We do a wide spectrum of entertainment. We welcome everybody.

Schools may receive support from tax hike

MARY EMERSON
Collegian

Property owners may be facing a raise in taxes to support local schools.

The district's local option budget is currently at 3 percent, and the Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 School Board has proposed to raise it to 15 percent.

"It is law that schools can levy up to 25 percent of the supplement general fund to form a supplemental general budget," David Mickey, associate superintendent for USD 383, said.

The schools use the money levied from the 24-mill fund for the LOB.

This budget gives them extra money on top of the funds from the state government.

"Nobody wants to have an LOB as part of their school finance package, but this is the only way we can add funds," Joleen Hill, school board member and candidate, said.

There are four reasons why the 12-percent increase has been proposed.

First, the school board's budgethas increased.

"The Board of Education is faced with a continued increase in budget. We won't be able to fund our budget without the general supplemental fund money," Mickey said.

Second, USD 383 is in the process of opening another grade school and two new middle schools.

The approximate cost to open the grade school is $210,000 and $750,000 for each middle school, Colleen Hampton, candidate for school board, said.

The Comprehensive District Technology Plan that has been started in the schools is the third reason. It will cost $5.4 million to complete. .

Money for the plan mainly comes from a bond, but more money is required, Mickey said.

The last reason for the increase is to give the teachers in the district pay raises.

Any increase in salary during the last few years has been nominal.

"Hopefully, if the LOB passes, we may be able to give our staff a 3-percent raise," Mickey said.

Depending on how much money the Kansas Legislature decides to allow schools, it may not be necessary to use the full 15-percent LOB.

"A 12-percent LOB will give us the flexibility to give teachers raises and pay for the technology plan. Now, if the Legislature comes through, we may not need all of it," Debbie Nuss, school board member and candidate, said.

If the whole LOB is needed, property owners will see a substantial raise in their taxes.

Michael Pearson, school board candidate, said the average home in Manhattan is valued around $73,000. This means taxes will be about $150 a year.

There is a law that if 5 percent of the registered voters demand it, the LOB can be put to a vote, Mickey said.

A protest petition has been filed with 1,900 names on it.

Hampton said if the petition is valid, the shool board must then make a decision whether to go ahead with a vote or drop the LOB increase.

Others favor a smaller LOB increase and believe that 12 percent is too much.

Larry Weaver, school board candidate, said, "I would've supported a minimal LOB this year. I was in favor of 6 percent, which is smaller than they, in fact, passed."

Pearson also said he would have been more supportive of a 5- to 6-percent increase.

Having the money allows the board some flexibility in case the Legislature does not allot the schools enough funds.

"We don't know what kind of budget increases the Legislature will give us," Mary Nichols, school board member and candidate, said. "It is all very uncertain.

"I didn't like it, but there is no other option for the board," she said. "I voted for it, but I hope we don't have to use all of it."

Students learn from trees

Event provides learning experience, chance to celebrate

LINDA HARVEY
Collegian

By playing around in the dirt, students from Lee School got to help the earth and celebrate Kansas Arbor Day Friday.

Under the supervision of K-State Horticultural Therapy students, fifth-grade students from Jan Gibbs' class planted six Austrian Pine trees in the front lawn of the school.

"This was kind of a unique idea," Gibbs said. "These kids have a lot of energy."

Gibbs got her students involved in outdoor activities prior to the planting.

The students cleared an area in front of their school to plant the trees.

"The kids were out there slinging around the dirt like they were digging for gold," said Luther Pennell, student teacher and senior in elementary education.

The class started out the school year studying plants and talking about erosion.

"We want to teach them alternatives in learning about the environment," said Angela Kelley, graduate in horticultural therapy and coordinator of the activity.

Kelley went to a Topeka Lawn and Flower Show and won a pine tree in a random drawing.

She said winning the tree spawned the idea, and it snowballed from there.

Trees were donated by an anonymous source, and four horticultural therapy students donated their time to help the children.

The activity consisted of an hour-long presentation and the tree-planting.

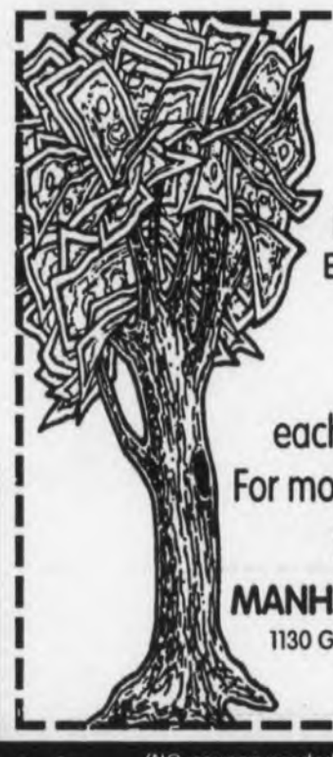
During the presentation, Kelley passed around pine cones and a pine needle to show the students what they looked like.

Kelley had the students throw the seeds from the cones up in the air to watch them spin like helicopter blades.

The students then met outside and split up into groups to plant the trees.

"It's going to grow," Katie Claussen, fifth-grade student, said, smiling and looking at the tree. "It's going to be cool."

After the planting, Kelley had the students step back and look at what they had planted.



"You all did a very good job out there," Kelley said. "You are the new owners of these trees."

As a surprise to the class, Kelley and her group presented the class with a certificate and gave each of the students a tree of their own to take home.

"This is cool," Michela Peterson, a fifth-grade student, said. "But we still have a pop quiz later."

TIPS FOR WRITING A CLASSIFIED AD

Always put what item or service you are advertising first. This helps potential buyers find what they are looking for.

Don't use abbreviations. Many buyers are confused by abbreviations.

Consider including the price. This tells buyers if they are looking at something in their price range.

CATEGORIES

To help you find what you are looking for, the classified ads have been arranged by category and sub-category. All categories are marked by one of the large images, and sub-categories are preceded by a number designation.

WE DO NOT USE PHONE NUMBERS OR LAST NAMES IN PERSONALS.

a shot right was amazing.

"I can't believe it took an hour to take a twenty-second shot," he said.

Anderson said they were also going to the Phi Gamma Delta reunion Saturday night to talk to some of the members who lived in the house before the Pi Kapps.

"We're going to the Fiji reunion and try to get some older guys to talk about Duncan to give the story some history," Anderson said.

Even though having a TV show being shot in their house was exciting, many of the Pi Kapps didn't know if the show would put their house in a completely positive image.

"If you're into the ghost thing, it's pretty cool, but if you're not, it may seem like a joke," Keller said.

Shaun Pickering, freshman in business, said it depended on how UPN told the story.

"If they do it the way we tell them it happened, it will be good publicity, but if they twist it, watch out," he said.

Anderson said a date for the program to air has not been released, but viewers should look for it within the year on UPN.

Gene causes non-hereditary tumors

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — Scientists have found the first direct evidence that a gene causing hereditary breast and ovarian cancer also plays a role in far more common non-inherited tumors.

The hereditary cases appear in women who inherit a flawed version of the gene, which fails to suppress the development of cancer as the normal gene does. Some 10 percent or less of breast and ovarian tumors are hereditary.

Now, for the first time, scientists have found flawed versions of the gene in non-hereditary ovarian tumors. The genes were normal when inherited but became flawed within the patients' own bodies.

In addition, other scientists have found that the gene is under-active in non-inherited breast cancers, suggesting it may play a role in those tumors even if it is not flawed.

Scientists said the findings offer no immediate payoff for treatment. But by implicating the gene in more than just the hereditary cancers, the work suggests that developing therapies based on the gene could someday help more women.

About 182,000 cases of breast cancer and 26,600 cases of ovarian cancer are expected to be diagnosed in American women this year.

The gene, called BRCA1, causes about half of inherited breast cancers. It made headlines last year when it was finally found after a long search.

The finding of flawed BRCA1 genes in non-inherited ovarian tumors is reported by two groups in the April issue of the journal Nature Genetics. One group, from the universities of Michigan and Pennsylvania and the National Institutes of Health, reports the finding in four of 47 tumors. A second team, from England and Canada, found a single example.

Results suggest that flaws in the BRCA1 gene may be involved in at least 10 percent of non-inherited ovarian cancers, Dr. Sofia Merajver of the University of Michigan Medical School, lead author of one report, said.

Some regions of the gene have not yet been thoroughly examined, and they may produce more examples of flaws in non-inherited cancer, she said.

The gene could be implicated in still more cases if its anti-cancer control is stymied by other means, such as defects in other genes that turn BRCA1 on and off, she said.

That idea is advanced in the breast cancer study, which also appears in Nature Genetics. Researchers from the Vanderbilt University School of Medicine in Nashville, Tenn., report that the BRCA1 gene is much less active in non-inherited breast tumors than in normal breast tissue.

In addition, when the researchers artificially reduced the effect of BRCA1 in normal and cancerous breast cells, it made the cells grow and divide faster. Such fast growth is a hallmark of cancer.

The results support the notion that a decrease in the control BRCA1 exerts over cell growth can help cause non-inherited breast cancer, Vanderbilt researcher Jeffrey Holt said.

That could occur even if the BRCA1 gene is perfectly normal. The decrease could be caused by defects in genes that control BRCA1's activity levels, Holt said.

Scientists can now try to identify those genes and see if they are flawed in non-inherited breast and ovarian cancer, he said.

Dr. Barbara Weber of the University of Pennsylvania School of Medicine in Philadelphia called Holt's work an important lead.

Tribunal hears censorship complaint

WADE SISSON
Collegian

More testimony is needed before Student Tribunal reaches a decision in a complaint brought by Metazine, a group that sought and was denied $150 to fund an alternative magazine.

Metazine was designed to bring together writers, artists, anthropologists, educators and mass communicators in order to produce and distribute an alternative magazine, according to the group's Union Activities Board registration form.

The group in October reported a membership of 55 students, five community members and 40 faculty and staff members.

Tribunal chancellor Kathryn Wesolowsky Monday night said a continuance of testimony had been set in motion, giving Tribunal seven class days to reach a decision on the case.

Two days of preparation must now be given to the complainant and respondent before additional testimony can be heard, Wesolowsky said.

The hearing began Monday afternoon about a complaint filed after Senate denied Metazine's funding request March 2. In the complaint, Metazine president David Kromm said Student Senate had violated two funding sections.

The sections Kromm referred to say Senate shall not discriminate on the basis of non-merit reasons such as political beliefs when considering funding requests, and that the viewpoint of a group should not be a consideration when considering such requests.

"We're objecting to the procedure," Kromm said. "No representative of ours was there. The magazine wasn't published, and it's very expensive and time-consuming to make a prototype."

Because he left after speaking during the Senate meeting's open period, Kromm said his group's request and the magazine's contents were taken out of context.

Kromm said senators made insinuations about the content of the magazine, which contained a photograph of a nude man.

"There was no attempt to determine the truth of (the insinuations), and people went ahead and voted anyway," Kromm said.

A witness for Kromm's case was unable to testify before Tribunal because of an emergency, Kromm said.

Presenting his testimony, Senate chair Clayton Wheeler said he ruled statements senators made about the magazine's content were out of order.

"Student Senate didn't vote on the basis of content because I ruled it out of order," Wheeler said.

As a witness for Wheeler, Bill Muir, faculty representative to Senate, said he decided to vote against the allocation before the content comments were made.

Muir said one of the reasons he opposed funding the group was that the Fine Arts Committee had already given money to the group.

Senate's tendency, Muir said, was to deny funding to any group that received funding from another source.

"That's the way it's in place now — there will be no supermarket shopping," Muir said.

Another reason Metazine's request for funding was denied, Wheeler said, was the group's intention to charge students for its publications.

"The precedent we've set in the four years I've been here is that we don't fund fundraisers without a promise of reimbursement," Wheeler said.

SGA money for free HIV tests runs out

CARRIE COX
Collegian

K-State students will no longer be able to receive HIV tests free of charge.

Kelly Fink, Lafene health educator, said as of Monday, 250 HIV tests have been used by K-State students. The remaining 20 tests are being issued to students who have set up appointments to receive tests.

"It's very encouraging for us to see students take advantage of this service. It means that more and more students are taking responsibility and looking out for themselves," she said.

Even though HIV tests are no longer free of charge, Fink said she hopes students still continue to be tested if they feel they may be at risk.

"We would hate for someone to keep from being tested just because the tests aren't free. We don't want students to see the cost of an HIV test as an inhibitor," she said.

The free tests were allocated from the Student Governing Association last fall. The money was collected through an excess of funds received when students were overcharged 50 cents for fees and tuition.

Fink said Lafene wanted to thank SGA for the opportunity to provide free HIV tests to students.

"SGA was able to see that this may be a need, and we found out that it was. I'm sure many students took that extra step to get tested because of the incentive they provided," she said.

Fink said Lafene will continue the pre- and post-counseling sessions for all students who make HIV test appointments. They will also continue to use the same policies and procedures, which were developed specifically for students who are tested for HIV.

Fink said HIV tests will now return to their normal cost of $28. However, she said Lafene will work with anyone who feels they are at risk and cost is a serious problem.

"We want everyone to be able to get themselves tested if they want to be. Lafene is willing to accommodate anyone who needs special arrangements due to a lack of money available," she said.

You can see the world at K-State this week during International Week.

Flags from every country represented by students at K-State surrounded the opening ceremony yesterday in the Union Courtyard.

"The flags symbolize the fact that K-State is an international university," Bill Richter, assistant provost of international programs, said.

The German folk song choir opened the ceremony with a German song.

Ann Claussen, assistant director and program director of the K-State Union, welcomed everyone to the ceremony and announced the theme for the week: "Come See The World."

Susan Scott, associate dean of student life, thanked international students for enriching the student life at K-State.

"International students contribute to our everyday lives," Scott said.

Manhattan Mayor Helen Cooper declared this week International Week both in Manhattan and at K-State.

"I would ask you to carry a feeling of fellowship and warmth with you, not just this week, but make it a part of your everyday life," Cooper said.

Student Body President Jeff Peterson said he has seen the changes international students have made on campus.

"I have seen a lot of leadership from International students," Peterson said.

Students from Amanda Arnold Elementary School and Eugene Field School performed cultural skits and danced.

Srini Sundhararajan, president of the International Coordinating Council, said he hopes this week will be a chance for students to share their cultures. He said international students all have their own interests within their culture.

"International students get a lot of satisfaction by displaying their cultures," Sundhararajan said.

Brewery to open again in mid-April

NOLAN SCHRAMM

The Little Apple Brewery, which shut its doors for reorganization last December, will reopen April 17 under new management.

It will have an expanded menu and seven new flavors of microbrewed beer. The beer has been a local art of the brewery since its arrival in Manhattan's Westloop late in 1993.

Many patrons were taken by surprise when the brewery suddenly shut its doors and its spigots last December.

And many employees, who were unaware the bar would be closing, came back from visiting relatives during semester break to find they were out of a job.

Jazz aficionados had begun to call the restaurant/bar home to Manhattan's burgeoning jazz scene.

The former management had placed a good deal of emphasis on the weekly live jazz shows,

Mother Earth, heritage hurt by development of sacred lands

SARA SMITH
Collegian

Native American spiritual heritage is being threatened by development on sacred lands, a speaker said Monday morning in the Union Little Theatre.

Native American Heritage Month

"It is up to us whether or not we are going to survive. Nobody would dream of abusing their mother or grandmother, but our actions are abusive to Mother Earth," said Henrietta Mann, interim dean of instruction and professor in Indian studies at Haskell Indian Nations University.

Mann took the analogy a step further, adding that religion is an area in people's lives that is always positive, but that attitude doesn't always carry over into the way people live their lives.

"Nobody would ever utter a negative prayer. And yet our actions sometimes stray a little off of being positive," she said.

Mann stressed the importance of Mother Earth to the Native American culture, saying she represents motherhood and womanhood in Native American religion.

"She is the most loving, most supportive woman on Earth, and she is Mother Earth," she said.

Mann said more damage has been done to the Earth in the last 500 years than in all of history.

▶ OIL SPILL ON MANHATTAN AVENUE TEMPORARILY DIVERTS TRAFFIC

An oil spill at the intersection of North Manhattan and Bluemont avenues temporarily diverted traffic Monday evening.

Traffic was diverted around the spill for more than half an hour while firefighters used sand to absorb the oil.

Riley County Police Officer Les Newey was driving west on Bluemont Avenue at about 8 p.m. when he noticed something in the middle lane of Bluemont Avenue on the east side of the intersection.

Newey said it was fortunate that he noticed the spill quickly to prevent a traffic accident.

"It happened about five or six cars in front of me. It had only spilled about a minute and a half because it was still running when I saw it," Newey said.

"If I hadn't found it right away so the fire department could contain it, it would have been a major traffic hazard," Newey said. "Then if it would have started raining, the rain would have made it even worse."

Several sets of dark, black tire tracks extended for almost a block east on Anderson Avenue from the area of the spill.

Apparently some cars drove though the spilled substance before traffic was diverted around it.

Battalion Chief Mike Heptig of the Manhattan Fire Department said the spilled substance was automotive engine oil.

Heptig said the fire department routinely responds to fluid spills at car accidents.

He said about three gallons of oil were spilled.

"It probably fell out of the back of someone's vehicle," he said."

Twenty pounds of sand were used to contain the spill within the middle lane.

▶ DOLLAR PLUMMETS IN VALUE TO YEN

WASHINGTON (AP) — The dollar hit another record low against the Japanese yen Monday.

Currency traders estimated that the Federal Reserve, acting on orders from the administration, sold Japanese yen and German marks to purchase dollars in a sum estimated at $1.5 billion to $2 billion, possibly a record for Fed dollar purchases.

However, the administration's intervention in currency markets did little more than halt a steep decline in the dollar. In late New York trading, the U.S. currency was still below its levels of last Friday against both the yen and the mark.

▶ CLEANUP TO LEAVE VAST CONTAMINATION

WASHINGTON (AP) — The cleanup of radioactive waste left over from decades of nuclear weapons production will take longer than the Cold War itself.

It will cost between $230 billion and $350 billion, the government estimated Monday.

The largest environmental cleanup ever undertaken still is expected to leave hundreds of acres contaminated with buried debris and cordoned off from the public. Many of the other areas could have only limited uses.

The Energy Department envisions a middle-of-the-road approach to cleaning up the legacy from nuclear research, production and testing.

▶ UNITED WAY OFFICIAL CONVICTED OF FRAUD

ALEXANDRIA, Va. (AP) — Former United Way of America president William Aramony was convicted Monday of stealing nearly $600,000 from the nation's biggest charity and lavishing it on young women, some only in their teens.

A federal jury deliberated over seven days before finding Aramony guilty of 25 counts of fraud, conspiracy and money laundering.

Aramony was charged along with Thomas J. Merlo and Stephen J. Paulachak with siphoning off money that had been donated to the charity by businesses and individuals. Merlo was convicted of 17 counts; Paulachak of eight.

▶ MINNESOTA APPEALS COURT REVERSES DECISION AGAINST CHURCH

ST. PAUL, Minn. (AP) — A $9.15 million award against the First Church of Christian Science in the death of an 11-year-old boy whose mother relied on prayer to treat his diabetes is being thrown out by the Minnesota Appeals Court.

In a 2-1 decision to be filed today, the court ruled that the Boston-based church does not have to pay $9 million in punitive damages or $150,000 in compensatory damages to Ian Lundman's father.

The church's practice of spiritual healing is protected by the Constitution and the church did not act in deliberate disregard of Ian's rights, the court said.

But the court upheld $1.5 million in compensatory damages against Ian's mother and stepfather, Kathleen and William McKown, and two practitioners they hired to provide spiritual treatment. The McKowns had a duty to protect the boy from harm, and the practitioners should have overruled the parents' wishes and sought medical help, the panel said.

The boy died in 1989 after falling into a diabetic coma. His father, Douglass Lundman, filed a wrongful death suit against the church and five church members, saying the boy could have been treated up until two hours before his death.

They will pay for stupid tricks

UPC to sponsor show featuring student talent

COBY HESS
Collegian

Anyone who could use a quick $50 can perform their favorite stupid human trick for the Union Program Council's Eclectic Entertainment Committee.

The committee is sponsoring K-State's first talent show at 6:30 p.m. April 26 in Union Station.

The show will include the top 10 participants.

Sign-ups end Thursday.

Mike Hodgson, UPC Eclectic Entertainment chairman, said as of Monday, nobody had signed up.

"We've done an awful lot of work preparing for this, but we need 10 performers, or we'll have to cancel the show," he said.

Auditions are at 6:30 p.m. Monday in the main ballroom of the K-State Union.

Holly Bane, Eclectic Entertainment Committee chairperson, said the committee thought of the idea of having a talent show last year but didn't have enough time to do it.

"We are trying to come up with new ideas and activities that have never been provided at K-State," she said.

Hodgson said the judges will look for poise, ability, interesting content and overall effectiveness of the performance.

"In order to make judging fair, we're going to take one person from the audience, one from UPC executive board and one on the Eclectic Entertainment Committee," he said.

Each performer must be able to set up, perform and take down any equipment within 10 minutes.

Hodgson said other things the judges will be looking for are confidence, skill level and energy.

"We're hoping to promote campus involvement by having students perform various talents and skills," he said.

The first place winner will receive $50. Cash prizes will also be awarded to the second- and third-place performers.

Bane said she is surprised nobody has signed up yet, especially since cash prizes are being awarded.

"We've had some people come in to talk to us about the show, but no one has signed up yet," she said.

Party wants to give average students a voice

STEPHANIE STEENBOCK

The Wild Turkee Worker's Party officially announced its entrance into student government elections Monday at the sundial in the quad.

Trent LeDoux, agriculture senator candidate, said the party chose to announce at the sundial because it is in the middle of campus.

"It symbolizes meeting in the middle and our commitment to giving students a voice on campus," LeDoux said.

C.J. Lobmeyer, agriculture senator candidate, said he chose to run with the party because historically the party has been important.

"I am really impressed with the diversity of the members of the party," Lobmeyer said.

The Wild Turkee Worker's Party was started in 1991 by Ed Skoog, Steffany Carrel, Andrew Tomb, David Frese and Eric Henry. The Wild Turkee party members said they believe in giving average students the power to discuss pertinent issues and have a voice in University activities without resorting to manipulative and deceitful politics.

This year, the Wild Turkee Party encompasses almost every college at K-State.

LeDoux said members of the party are diverse.

"We're not the Ken and Barbie of SGA. We are all different than the normal senator," LeDoux said.

Among other concerns, student empowerment, fee system changes and classroom facility upgrades are important issues, the candidates said.

"A key is that we want to empower students and look for ways to solve problems," Jennifer Higerd, arts and science senator candidate, said.

The party members said they believe students should have the right to make decisions about University issues.

"The power of students should not be reserved for a special minority but should be equally distributed to a majority of students from a diverse range of backgrounds," Russell Fortmeyer, engineering senator candidate, said.

The party would also like to look at the possibility of creating a user-fee system. This would mean that if you don't use it, you don't pay for it.

"Restructuring the fee system is very important to our party," said Sean Tomb, arts and sciences senator candidate.

The Wild Turkees would like to see campus and community safety addressed. They said they

6 bills approved Monday

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Senators and House members began negotiating Monday over most of the next state budget, but they put off decisions on contentious spending issues.

Negotiators did not reach an agreement on spending on public elementary, junior high and high schools, nor did they come to a compromise on appropriations for the court system.
Those items will come up later, however.

Joint conference committees did reach agreement on six bills, the largest of which contains the proposed budget for the Department of Transportation for the state's 1996 budget year, which begins July 1.

When legislators finish their work on the budget, it should be within a few million dollars of Gov. Bill Graves' budget proposals, which would have state government spend about $7.8 billion in all.

The conference committees are supposed to draft the final, compromise versions of the budget bills. They were appointed because House and Senate versions contained differences.

The six bills agreed upon Monday would appropriate $1.5 billion, or about 19 percent of the entire budget.

Of the $1.5 billion, only $334 million would be from the state general fund, where the state deposits most of its sales, income and excise tax revenues.

The same three senators and three House members were on each of the six conference committees, a situation that is normal.

However, the three House members consulted frequently with six or seven other representatives, who sat behind them.

IN OUR OPINION

by the Collegian Editorial Board

Vote Kastner, Hall in city commission election

The Collegian is endorsing two candidates for city commission, Justin Kastner and Steve Hall.

Today is election day for city commission and school board. The Collegian is endorsing two candidates for city commission, Justin Kastner and Steve Hall.

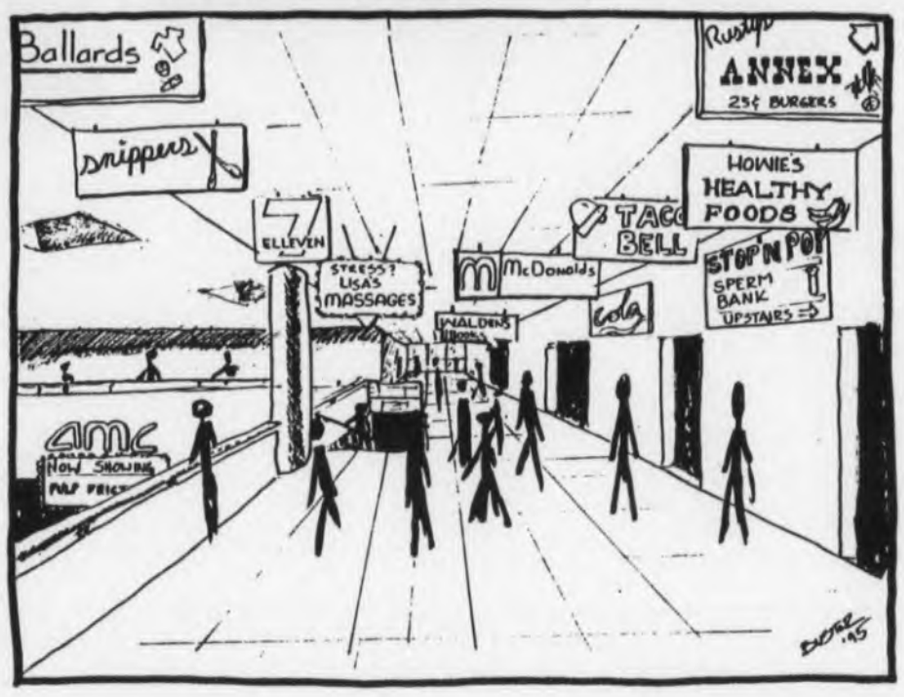
Kastner, junior in food science and industry, is a student, but he is not a child. He is organized and aware of the job he is getting into.

More importantly, he will represent students. If you have ever wondered why the street your house is on has no lights, it is because city commission has been able to ignore students.

The city gets tax money from the campus. Kastner was a student representative on the task force to set goals for the use of that money. He can make sure it gets used for those goals.

Hall has experience; he has served on city commission for two years.

He has insisted the commission be accountable for the tax dollars it spends.



He is also willing to get the public's opinion. He has come out in favor of putting the issue of the site for a new business park to a public vote, making sure the city commission is representing the public.

Being represented is the whole reason to vote.

Kastner and Hall will see our needs are met.

BUSTER'S LAST LAUGH

"THE UNION SOMEDAY..."

Students need service, quality in government

Editor's note: This is the second of a five-column series written by the student body presidential and vice presidential candidates. It is meant to give the candidates an opportunity to share their concerns and platforms in-depth. The columns will run daily in the order that the candidates will appear on the ballots.

The only true measurement of quality is in the eyes of the student. In other words, the student defines what is quality and what is not quality. This year, the service that SGA provided to the student was anything but quality. We realize that is a pretty hefty statement, but let us explain why SGA was not quality. The students are here for one reason and one reason only: to get an education.

Every other aspect of K-State is supplementary. Supplementary student services, like Parking Services, financial aid and especially the Student Union are here for the sole purpose of complementing our education and make getting it a little more convenient.

If, at any time, those services become a concern, a hassle or a problem, then they no longer are convenient, they no longer compliment our education, and they are not quality services. Now here is how SGA fits into the equation. By being the organization that represents the students in administrative matters, they are responsible for keeping those supplementary services quality. Parking Services, in the eyes of the students, isn't quality. Union Food Services isn't quality in the eyes of the students. These services are not quality in the eyes of the students, and SGA is responsible.

JEREMY BLAIR

Here's why we have those problems. SGA does not see themselves as a service organization. Before SGA can be a quality service in the eyes of the students, SGA itself must realize that its justification for existence is to be committed to the student, committed to quality and committed to exceeding the students' expectations.

DOUG BASSETT

The students are busy with getting an education. That's why they're here. SGA should be the last thing they have to worry about. SGA should be a service that takes care of students' problems quickly and efficiently with minimal involvement from the students, because if the students had the time to spend, they would fix it themselves. SGA should be the first and last place a student comes to with a problem. That is service, and Doug Bassett and I will work harder to see that it gets done.

A lot of issues will come up in this election — campus safety, lowering student fees, etc., and these are all genuine concerns, but without service and quality in SGA, nothing will change. If any leadership in SGA is not totally dedicated to the students, and exceeding their expectations in terms of service and quality, then standard operating procedure will prevail as it did this year, and nothing will change and problems will remain. SGA needs a new philosophy, a new way of thinking, a new direction toward being quality in the eyes of the student.

Jeremy Blair, presidential candidate
Doug Bassett, vice presidential candidate

▶ BIKE FEE

Bicyclists should help pay for paths, racks

Dear editor,

I am writing in response to the recent discussion about bikes on campus and the development of facilities such as bike paths and increased numbers of bike racks.

"The only way this is going to work is if people understand that some sacrifice will come from all the parties."

KRISTIN HERMES
freshman in journalism and mass communications

First of all, I would like to sincerely congratulate those who do choose to use a mode of transportation that is so much more efficient in so many ways. By saving space in parking lots and by reducing the amount of pollution that goes into the air, they are certainly to be thanked.

But most importantly, the trend of increasing numbers of students choosing to ride bikes must be encouraged.

The most reasonable method of encouraging such a trend is making sure that amenities, such as the bike racks and better paths, are provided to those who would consider taking a bike, rather than a car, to campus.

Granted, the proposed $5 charge to register students who choose to ride a bike is not a perfect solution since the improvements will benefit more people than just the bike riders. An increased number of bikers means fewer cars in the parking lots, and therefore students who drive will have a few more valuable spots in the lots each semester.

However, I believe any organization — Parking Services, Student Senate or whoever — will be hard-pressed to find this "perfect" solution. The fact is, someone will have to pay for the bike paths and bike racks. Ideally, the University would just absorb the costs, but that is not going to happen.

The only way this is going to work is if people understand that some sacrifice will come from all the parties. Maybe the best (albeit not ideal) solution is a voluntary sort of payment of the $5 fee, although what are the honest chances of success by that method?

I understand that those who choose to ride bikes are doing nearly everyone a favor by the choice they made to leave the car at home. But someone will have to pay for the improvements, and if Student Senate or the University won't absorb the bills (which I would bet on), then it only makes sense for those who benefit the most directly to be responsible for the improvement and development of the services.

▶ INTERNATIONAL STUDENTS

ICC provides social, educational activities

Dear editor,

No friends, we are not starting a discussion here of either the United Nations or of any other current major international issues. These are catchwords of the International Coordinating Council on campus.

The ICC is an umbrella organization comprised of about 18 different student groups like the African Students Association, Indonesian Students Association, India Students Association and so on. There are currently about 1,200 international students (or Wildcats) on campus. The primary goals of this council have been to function as a representative body for the international students on campus, to organize cultural festivals like African Nite, India Nite, International Nite, and so on, so as to increase the cultural awareness of the Manhattan community and finally, to help international students arriving each semester to acclimatize themselves to an environment that is both exciting and scary, interesting and uncertain.

The world today moves toward a multiracial plural society, full of democratic promise. With the globalization of the market economy, today's work environment is extremely diverse. Therefore, understanding other religions, races and cultures is now becoming increasingly essential. An education about a different culture helps you understand how other people think. It improves your ability to interact with people, as you now have an insight into their method of thinking, their behavior and mannerisms. It is an experience that enriches your mind and warms your heart. It is something that has to be experienced to be understood and appreciated.

The African Students Association will be giving the Manhattan community an education on African culture when they present African Nite on April 22.

The ICC organizes at least a dozen such events each academic year.

Demonstrating a spirit of oneness and unity among the international students, the ICC will present International Week April 3-8. The week will include various activities, some of which are a panel discussion, an Exhibition, international films and so on. International food will be served in the Stateroom during this time. The week will culminate with the Cultural Nite on April 8, an evening of education and enjoyment. Cultural Nite will feature an International Fiesta (which includes various delicacies from around the world) and an International Cultural show which includes performances from around the world.

The organization and planning of these events on such a large scale involves a lot of time, money and most importantly, effort. These events are organized by international students on campus. Their reward is the feeling of achievement and satisfaction they get when they share their culture.

If any institution or individual is interested in supporting these activities either monetarily or otherwise, please contact the Foreign Student Office at 532-6448/ Srini Sundhararajan at 537-4355.

Public Relations Chairperson, ICC

▶ CITY COMMISSION ELECTIONS

Kastner isn't responsible enough

Dear editor,

This letter is in response to Jeff Peterson's column in the Collegian supporting Justin Kastner in the upcoming election. In his column concerning the advisory board for the annexation of K-State, Peterson stated, "Justin recommended to the city commission that University tax dollars be used to help students by constructing bicycles racks and routes, additional lighting near campus and the development of an electronic link between Farrell Library and Manhattan Public Library."

"This is not an issue of age, but an issue of maturity, and I do not feel that Kastner has the maturity it takes to hold such an important position."

CHRIS WILSON
junior in pre-veterinary medicine

Unfortunately, Peterson is greatly misled. There was a panel of nine individuals who agreed to send all of those recommendations to the city commission, not solely Kastner, and seven of those individuals were Manhattan residents who were just taking an interest in their community.

In fact, Kastner wasn't even present when the chair of the advisory committee had to go before the city commission and state what the panel had done and their reasons for approving every project. So in retrospect, if Peterson wants to name one single individual as the person who made the recommendation to the city commission, the chairperson of the panel should be named.

Peterson made his column sound like K-State would not have a voice. That definitely isn't true and is proved by the panel of Manhattan residents coming together and unanimously voting to send all recommendations onto the city commission. Also, in attending some of the panel's meetings, I was embarrassed to acknowledge that Justin Kastner was a fellow student at K-State.

From what I observed, he did not contribute much to the panel except a good laugh, and when he was asked a question, he either gave out a long, drawn-out answer without ever really answering the question, or he referred the question to the other student representative. He also didn't pay attention at different times when topics were being discussed and had to ask questions several different times. I am not against a student of any age running for public office. This is not an issue of age, but an issue of maturity, and I do not feel that Kastner has the maturity it takes to hold such an important position.

▶ CITY COMMISSION ELECTIONS

Kastner is the best candidate for the job

Dear editor,

It is my pleasure to write a letter of support for my friend, Justin Kastner, candidate for City Commission.

Through working with Justin on several different projects, I have developed a tremendous amount of respect for his abilities, talents, character and integrity.

Justin's different perspective and background on several issues make him uniquely qualified to serve us on the Commission. One example of this unique perspective is his views on youth issues in Manhattan. Having experienced firsthand growing up in Manhattan and going through our school system, Justin is well aware of potential points for improving the overall situation. If the history is any indicator, Justin is by far well qualified to serve us on the City Commission.

During the first primary election, Justin did very well throughout the city and on campus. However, turnout in this election was incredibly low. Only 43 people in all of the residence halls voted out of 1,000 eligible voters. Now more than ever, it is important for students to register and vote in city elections, because the University has now been annexed into the city, and by voting in city elections, it is your opportunity to vote your concerns. Because whether you like it or not, city government can have a tremendous effect on your life. By voting for Justin, you can ensure that your concerns will be heard.

Please join me in voting for one of the best candidates the city has the ability to elect. Please vote for Justin Kastner for City Commission on April 4.

Aaron Otto
arts and sciences senator

▶ CONTRACT WITH AMERICA

Environment is under attack

Dear editor,

The laws that protect our environment are under unprecedented attack in the current Congress. The attack is part of almost every element of the Contract With America, but the most immediate threat is the "Property Rights" legislation just introduced into the Senate and just passed by the House.

The proponents of "Property Rights" have been very loud and have generated a lot of misinformation. Many well-meaning people have been duped into support of this by the tactics of the greedy. Congress has allowed itself to be intimidated to the point that they no longer care about the facts.

The fact is that protection of the world around us is vital to our survival. The Clean Air Act and the Clean Water Act directly affect public health. The "Private Property" act would make the taxpayer pay people to not pollute.

Instead of protecting our most threatened resources with the Endangered Species Act, we'll now be encouraging speculators to further abuse. If anyone tries to stop them, they can demand compensation from the taxpayer's pocket. The destruction of our world is a debt every bit as real as the national debt.

With an ever-increasing human population, the pressure we exert on our ecosystems will be greater and greater. We can look to the future with a public policy that maximizes the potential of our resources, or we can let those decisions be made by corporations, developers and speculators whose only concern is the bottom line.

If you care about your health and the well-being of future generations, let Senators Dole and Kassebaum know.

Trap to lessen flea problem

SHELLY FOGLE
Collegian

Protecting Fluffy and Fido from fleas may be easier now with the help of the intermittent light flea trap.

To control the flea problem, Dr. Michael Dryden, assistant professor of veterinary parasitology; Alberto Broce, professor of entomology; and Kent Hampton, research assistant of entomology, developed the trap.

Dryden said the trap emits a filtered yellow-green light to attract the minute parasite.

The light blinks on and off in order to simulate a shadow.

He said the yellow-green light may be perceived by the flea as sunlight reflecting on grass. The blinking, shadow-like image emulates an animal passing near the flea.

The shadow effect triggers the jump response of the flea toward the trap, Dryden said.

Dryden said in studies, the trap was 86-percent effective in attracting and trapping fleas compared to other traps that were 11-to-14 percent effective.

Fleas cause skin irritation and can eventually cause the pet to develop skin allergies, Bob Bossard, graduate student in entomology, said.

Common symptoms of flea infestation include scratching, licking, chewing at the hair, hair loss and restless behavior exhibited by the animal, Dryden said.

"Flea allergy is the most common allergy in dogs and cats," Dryden said.

Bossard said pets in Kansas have a flea problem because fleas thrive in areas of high humidity.

"Fleas do not occur as much further west because of low humidity," he said.

He said the most common flea in Kansas is the cat flea.

"Cat fleas can occur on other animals besides cats. Dogs have cat fleas, and they can get on farm livestock, as well," Bossard said.

Dryden said one of the latest means in controlling fleas is a once-a-month flea pill, called Program. The pill breaks the reproductive cycle of the flea.

"It is not the few fleas the animal picks up in the spring that is the problem, it is the reproduction of those fleas," he said.

The pill, developed by Ciba Animal Health, is available by prescription only from veterinarians.

HOW TO KEEP YOUR PET FLEALESS

Bob Bossard, graduate student in entomology, offers the following tips for controlling flea outbreak and infestation:

1. Keep pets in areas of low humidity
2. Ensure a clean environment for your pet.
3. Vacuum carpeted areas often.
4. Shampoo your pet frequently.
5. If possible, control the pet by keeping the animal indoors.

Multimedia can jazz up teaching

JANET GILLILAND
Collegian

Many instructors are changing their lectures with the fast-growing use of multimedia.

Paul Jennings, professor of horticulture, forestry and recreation resources, spoke Monday afternoon on "Digitizing for No-Chalk Teaching."

His speech was part of the 1995 Provost's Lecture Series.

"Multimedia is the integration of information, which exists in different forms, to enhance the teaching and learning experience," Jennings said.

Multimedia can be used for different education applications.

Jennings said there are three applications. The first one, which is the one that his speech was based on, is classroom instruction.

With classroom instruction, the instructor is present and controls the multimedia.

He said the other two applications it can be used with are individualized instruction, which is when the student is the director, and distance learning, which is a form of outreach learning.

Jennings is in his second semester of using multimedia to teach.

Many instructors are using multimedia to make teaching more enjoyable and more effective, he said.

They do this by using five different areas within multimedia.

Jennings said the first area is text such as outlines, notes, definitions or any other types of reading material.

Multimedia can also be used to present graphics. Some examples include charts, diagrams, figures and illustrations.

"We can also import other types of materials, colorize graphics or copy and digitize them," Jennings said.

He said click graphics are very useful for his classes.

They allow him to click on one part of the plant and bring just that one part up so it can be viewed closer.

The third use of multimedia is with slides by digitizing them.

Video is the fourth form of information that can be integrated into multimedia.

Short film clips of processes, actions or techniques with motion are examples of video uses.

"It will eventually encompass virtual reality. I can envision in years to come of going into a plant and following the movement of food through the phloem or exploring the inner workings of a plant," Jennings said.

The last source of information for multimedia is audio.

Jennings said he has not used it for instruction, but he does use the CD ROM to play classical music before classes start.

"We can use any combination or all of these five information resources," he said.

Using multimedia in the classroom is not going to change the quality of teaching completely.

"Multimedia is not going to make anyone an excellent teacher. The machine is not going to substitute for the individual teacher.

support the idea of looking into a program that would be something like the block-mother program used by elementary schools, which offers a place where students could seek refuge in case of danger.

On campus, you can run into a building if you feel you are in danger.

The greek houses would provide a place for people to flee danger in the areas around campus.

The Wild Turkee party is a political party for the election; however, after the elections, it will represent its members' colleges and the University individually.

They said they realize they may have differences on issues that could arise after they are elected.

LeDoux said the party is a group of people with different ideas who are willing to talk about things that they agree and disagree on.

"Our primary concern is what students want. It is the students we need to focus on," LeDoux said.

Fortmeyer said out of all of the candidates for student body president, the Wild Turkee Worker's Party supports Andrew Tomb.

"I would encourage students to find out who is running in their colleges and to vote Wild Turkee," Andrew Tomb, student body presidential candidate, said.

The candidates said the motto of the party is "You've never had it so good, and it's time for a change."

'Real players' get the shaft; owners are next

Well, it's back.

After almost eight months, baseball will make its return to our society.

PHILL SPIKER

Sunday night the owners agreed to not lock out the players, and the players agreed to play without an agreement.

The season, which was scheduled to begin Sunday night, has now been pushed back to April 26, and each team will play 144 games, which is 18 fewer than the usual.

Baseball teams were told to release all their replacements — oh sorry, that's "real players" — by 11:59 p.m. EST Saturday, and every team jumped at the chance to get the "real scabs" back on the playing field.

The "real players" got the shaft from the owners. The owners were going to pay each "real player" a $25,000 bonus if the "real scabs" were still on strike on opening day.

"It felt like it was our money already," said Tim Dell, a "real player" pitcher for the Milwaukee Brewers. "The closer we got to opening day, the more we thought it was our money, and the more we felt like if we didn't get it, they were taking it from us."

The ironic thing is the "real scabs" might strike again this season. So, the owners may also get the shaft. The thing I don't understand is why the owners would even want the "real scabs" back?

The "real scabs" were the ones that decided in August to put to rest possibly the best season in baseball history.

And for what?

Absolutely nothing.

What did this strike accomplish?

I honestly can't think of a single positive thing that the strike did.

But, I can definitely name a bunch of the negatives.

■ The strike wrecked a record-breaking season, robbed the World Series and now has set back the beginning of this season three weeks.

■ Baseball still has the same economic system that was in place in August when the players walked out.

■ Nobody has made any promises.

The owners still might impose the salary cap after this season, and the players still might strike at the end of this season and leave fans with no fall classic again.

■ Large-market teams will most likely push for an agreement now, and players have the incentive to get a deal in before implementation of a salary cap happens again.

I think the large-market owners will be less likely to make a stand against the union because they aren't losing any money, and therefore giving the players a reason to strike would do nothing but hurt them financially.

■ It is the small-market clubs that will be hurt the most.

Clubs like Milwaukee, Kansas City, Pittsburgh and Montreal will not be able to afford the high-priced free agents.

I think this will turn these small-market teams into teams like the San Diego Padres. The Padres, who have the lowest payroll in the major leagues, have traded away experienced players like Fred McGriff and Gary Sheffield for young, inexperienced minor-league players.

Because of the cost cutting of the small-market clubs, the large-market clubs will pull in a majority of the high-priced free agents — boy are they worth it, too — causing a huge competition problem.

Maybe they should split the large-market teams and the small-market teams up into separate leagues. The small-market league champions would play the large-market league champions in a game that would reflect recent Super Bowls.

Wow. Wouldn't that be exciting?

■ Vendors and other employees at the ballparks were suddenly unemployed.

What about these people? They definitely got caught in the middle. Basically, these people had no say in what happened to their jobs. These people most likely depended on their jobs to make ends meet.

■ Last, but not least, the fans were robbed.

These are the people who really love the game. They come to see their heroes win the game in the bottom of the ninth or make a home-run-saving grab at the centerfield wall. These are the people who pay the price in the end.

A couple of days ago, I watched the film "Field of Dreams" on television. This movie made me realize how far baseball has come, and it made me remember what it was in its purest form — a game.

See, baseball is something your grandfather or father takes you to.

It gives people something to talk about when there is nothing to talk about.

Baseball is our past, but unfortunately, its own future is at stake.

"They've been kicked a little bit. They have to be shown how important they are. That's going to be a big job, that's not just something you can do with words. There's an old sign I saw one time — 'Don't tell me, show me,'" Detroit Tigers manager Sparky Anderson said.

It's going to take a little more than some public relations from the players, Sparky.

Baseball is going to have to take a long look at itself and its past because it is quickly being left behind.

Things need to change because lately baseball has been nothing but an old girlfriend that I can't get off my mind.

Well, let me tell you something honey: I'm better off without ya.

UCLA wins first title in 20 years

ASSOCIATED PRESS

SEATTLE — With its starting point guard on the bench and its greatest coach in the stands, UCLA won its first national championship in 20 years and kept Arkansas from joining the select list of repeaters.

UCLA 89
Arkansas 78

The top-ranked Bruins won their record 11th NCAA title Monday night with an 89-78 victory that was even more impressive considering senior Tyus Edney was limited to 2-1/2 minutes because of a sprained right wrist.

Ed O'Bannon stepped up as he was supposed to, but so did freshman Toby Bailey and Cameron Dollar, Edney's replacement, and it all meant the first title for the school since 1975, when John Wooden, who sat quietly in the stands of the Kingdome, won the last of 10 in a 12-year span.

As UCLA received the championship trophy, O'Bannon, who was named the most outstanding player in the tournament, turned to the Bruins' fans in the stands, pointed at Edney and shouted: "This is the real MVP right here. He got us here."

The UCLA fans then started chanting, "Tyus! Tyus! Tyus!"

For Arkansas, it was the end of a tournament run of close finishes, and it ended one game short of becoming the second repeat champion since Wooden's Bruins won seven in a row, ending in 1973.

The Razorbacks had come to rely on their great defense and a great player, Corliss Williamson, in the second half, but neither was there against UCLA.

O'Bannon scored 30 points and had 17 rebounds in a game that certified his all-America credentials. Bailey, who had struggled to a 1-for-2, two-point outing in the semifinals, finished with 26 points and nine rebounds. And Dollar, the backup point guard who played in the shadow of the lightning-quick Edney, came up with eight assists.

"I think he had the best tournament of any player of the 64 teams up until tonight," UCLA coach Jim Harrick said of Edney.

"But what a gutty performance by the rest of the guys. They sucked it up and played hard."

Williamson, who was 9-for-12 in the second half of the semifinal win over North Carolina, finished 3-for-16 from the field against the Bruins, including a 1-for-10 effort in the second half. Instead of the Razorbacks swarming and defending as they had all tournament in the latter stages of the game, it was the Bruins who managed to hold Arkansas without a field goal for a 4:47 stretch that ended with Williamson's first basket of the second half with 2:25 to play.

That made it 77-68, and the Razorbacks were out of the last-minute miracles they had managed in the early rounds.

The Bruins built a 65-53 lead with 11:27 left on a rebound basket by Bailey. Arkansas managed to get within 67-64 on a free throw by Williamson with 5:22 left, but O'Bannon hit a jump hook, and Bailey scored on yet another rebound. After O'Bannon and Dollar each made two free throws, and Bailey scored again, the lead was again 12 with 3:13 left.

Clint McDaniel led Arkansas with 16 points, and Willamson had 12. Scotty Thurman, the hero of last year's title win over Duke with a last-minute three-pointer, had five points on 2-for-9 shooting.

UCLA extended its lead in the title run, with Kentucky and Indiana second on the list with five each.

The Bruins are 11-1 in championship games, and this was their first without Wooden in front of the bench, rolled-up program in hand.

Arkansas was trying to join Duke in 1991 and 1992 as the only repeat champions since UCLA's streak ended. There have been five other repeaters, Oklahoma State in 1945-46, Kentucky in 1948-49, San Francisco in 1955-56, Cincinnati in 1961-62 and UCLA in 1964-65.

The victory was the 19th straight for UCLA, while the Razorbacks closed the season by winning 15 of 17.

Edney started the game but played just 2:37 and never returned. His only statistic was one turnover as he looked tentative and rarely let the ball even touch his right hand.

Edney had been so impressive in a penetrating performance against Oklahoma State in the semifinals where he scored 21 points and handed out five assists.

"Right before he warmed up, I knew he couldn't play," Harrick said.

"I started him, but I knew he couldn't play."

A frantic opening four minutes had the Razorbacks up 16-10, but the pace came to a standstill for about three minutes. Bailey hit a three-pointer and jumper in the lane to cap a 7-0 run that gave the Bruins a 34-26 lead.

The final minute of the first half was a lot like the start — there were four lead changes in that span, and freshman J.R. Henderson's layup with 10 seconds left gave UCLA the 40-39 halftime lead.

Dinah Watson attempts to hit a forehand shot during a set against Oklahoma's Monique Malan. Watson won the match 6-1, 4-6, 6-0. K-State returns to action Saturday against Colorado at L.P. Washburn Tennis Complex.

Netters drop second in a row to OU

BRIAN THOMAS
Collegian

In comparison to Sunday's Oklahoma State match, the K-State tennis team looked better Monday.

But Wildcat coach Steve Bietau said his team still has a way to go after dropping its second-straight Big Eight Conference match.

The Oklahoma Sooners slipped past the Cats 6-3 at the L.P. Washburn Tennis Complex.

With the loss, K-State fell to 1-2 in conference play and 7-8 overall.

"Our performance was a lot better," Bietau said.

"By standards of the OSU match, it was tremendously better. What a difference a day makes."

The Wildcats picked up two victories in the singles division against OU.

All-American Karina Kuregian, 23-5 and ranked No. 26 in the nation, extended her singles winning streak to nine matches with a 6-0, 6-1 victory against Anne Covert.

"Karina is playing very well," Bietau said.

"She is playing with a lot of confidence. She is really attacking on the court. She's had an impressive string of matches dating back to spring break."

Dinah Watson battled through another three-set match before defeating Monique Malan 6-1, 4-6, 6-0 in No. 3 singles.

"That was a gutty performance," Bietau said.

"Dinah always does that, though. She at times struggles with her confidence. She had a couple of long games that she squeaked out. Later, she played a little more aggressively and pulled out the match."

K-State dropped two out of three doubles matches on the day. The No. 17-ranked team of Kuregian and Martine Shrubsole improved its record to 15-2 overall after a 6-4, 6-4 victory against Oklahoma's Malan and Linda Cifranic.

"OU is strong in doubles," Bietau said. "Their No. 2 through No. 5 singles players are all virtually the same. They are an interchangeable group of people in doubles."

Next up for the Wildcats is a conference match-up with Colorado.

"They are another deep team," Bietau said.

"I picked them fourth of fifth in the coaches poll. I like playing them here rather than in Boulder.

"They are a scrappy team. They have to deal with the altitude in Colorado. They are much like the OU team we just faced. They are not very strong at the top but balanced throughout."

Action is scheduled for 10 a.m. Saturday at the L.P. Washburn Tennis Complex.

"Karina is playing very well."

BOARD OF EDUCATION

Text by Brian Heiar

The Collegian asked candidates for school board to answer specific questions. The questions included whether they support the local option budget, what would they do to fix the Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 budget deficit and how they feel about Outcome - Based Education and Quality Performance Accreditation.

Colleen Hampton

Hampton said she is against the LOB because the amount it allows for is more than the school district needs.

"Voters should vote on any tax increase made," Hampton said.

To work out the budget, the school board should consider delaying some new programs such as the technology program, she said.

Hampton said teachers have not had a raise in two or three years and deserve a raise. Administrators, however, should not get as much of a raise, she said.

Hampton said QPA is a better way to measure what children are learning and a big improvement over the old method of counting books in the school library and square footage of the school.

She said one problem with QPA is that if students do not pass a test, they are taught the material over and over until they pass. Since some children may never pass, this holds back some of the smarter students, Hampton said.

A problem with Roosevelt School is that the report cards no longer give letter grades and use only the QPA assessments, she said.

Kim Wells

Wells said she is opposed to the LOB. Budget cuts need to be made instead, she said.

The first area Wells said she would look at is administrative jobs, and she would try to decide which are necessary and then look at teachers to let go, she said.

"The first place to look is to allow teachers to opt for early retirement," Wells said.

Wells said she feels OBE is all right, but the state-mandated QPA has some problems with it.

It is a good way of making sure students have mastered what they have been taught, she said. Some schools with this program have a new section on their report card. This section has some ratings for the students that are not really important, like risk-taking, Wells said.

Deb Nuss

Nuss said she supports the LOB. She said the 12-percent increase gives the school district certain flexibility.

"We're not sure how much we will receive from the state until the September enrollment," Nuss said.

She said the school district should look at the non-mandated programs and decide which are not necessary.

She said she would look to extracurricular activities to make some cuts. When making cuts in athletics, she said she would make sure the sports for men and women are equitable.

Programs with matching funds, funds met partially by the state, would have to be weighed carefully because those programs are particularly difficult to reinstitute, she said.

Nuss said user fees could be considered to help pay for the budget.

Some of the teachers could assume administrative responsibilities, where it would be possible without too much burden on the teachers, she said.

Nuss said OBE has always been done, and it was just a new name for an old process, but QPA needs to be modified. Some of the paperwork needs to be eliminated, she said.

One of the biggest problems with OBE is that it is not well-understood, and there is a lot of negativism about it, Nuss said.

One of the better aspects of QPA is that it makes schools accountable for what they are teaching the students, and it is better than the old methods of counting square footage of a school or the number of books in the school library, she said.

Mary Nichols

Nichols said she supports the LOB because it is the last resort for the school district.

In order to fix the budget, she said she would look first at the administration and try to consolidate some of the jobs there.

She said she would look at getting rid of the six half-days in the schedule because they are not as economical.

"I want to try to keep people and cut things," Nichols said.

Although the district could not cut certain mandated programs, the effectiveness of some other programs could be assessed, she said.

Nichols said another possible means of budget balancing is adding user fees. Computer skills may be expensive to teach, but they cannot be cut because of their necessity, Nichols said.

She said that although QPA is state-mandated, there is some dissatisfaction with it.

QPA means added paperwork for the schools without added state funding, she said. There is no direction from the state for the paperwork, Nichols said.

Joleen Hill

Hill said that although no one wants the 12-percent increase in the LOB, it is necessary. It is the only way the school district can add funds, she said.

The timing is not good for the LOB because of variables like the fact that the Kansas Legislature has not told the school board how much funding it will receive, she said.

Hill said she supports QPA because it makes schools accountable and provides good goals.

Some of the assessments of the students need to be reviewed to decide whether they are necessary because they are so difficult to assess, she said.

This is a program that will never be completed and will be continually refined, Hill said.

Phil Morgan

Morgan said some cuts need to be made to the LOB before it goes into effect. It would have been better if it were not so large, he said.

The current budget is a rather large, almost $25 million, she said. It can be cut, and everything in the budget must be evaluated to decide what should be cut, Morgan said.

"Everything is on the table and should be looked at to make the cuts," Morgan said.

The budget should be cut without hurting the educational integrity of the schools, he said.

Morgan said it does not matter what the school district feels about QPA, because it is a state-mandated policy and cannot be changed by the school district.

He said OBE was something the community wanted, so it should be in place. Morgan said every part of the school district should be evaluated on a yearly basis.

Because OBE may not work as it was supposed to work and because there is enough concern about OBE, it must be reevaluated, Morgan said.

Mike Pearson

Pearson said he does not support the LOB. He said it allows the school new expenditures without any budget cuts.

It would be better if there were a more moderate increase of 5 to 6 percent and if it allowed for a cost-of-living increase for teachers, he said.

Pearson said he would look at all parts of the budget, such as the school district's purchasing policy, to see if the district is getting the most for its money.

The school board needs to find out if all the programs are necessary and cut unnecessary ones, he said. Pearson said if elected, he would use his experience as an accountant.

"I'll dig through the budget to see what is and isn't necessary. That's my strength," Pearson said.

Any cuts in faculty would be made through attrition to try to minimize the stress as much as possible, Pearson said. He said a freeze should be made on hiring.

Pearson said QPA is necessary because tests in previous years have found our education system is not working.

With QPA, teachers adapt to students, rather than the other way around. This is important, he said, because students learn at different rates and should not be forced to learn at the rate dictated by the teacher.

Larry Weaver

Weaver said he is opposed to a 12-percent LOB increase. He said he would do his best to make sure it passed with half that amount levied.

When working on the budget, he said he would not look at any one thing but look at many areas. The first programs that should be cut are programs that could be easily restarted, Weaver said.

In faculty cuts, Weaver said he would look to where the schools had fewer students and would need fewer teachers. These cuts would be made by attrition if possible, he said.

"We hope to get young, new, enthusiastic teachers, but we would be losing expensive but good older teachers," Weaver said.

Cutbacks could also be made on intermural activities such as athletics, music and debate, he said.

Weaver said QPA is a better way to assess students' abilities.

Some of the things measured by QPA are silly, he said. Cooperation, for example, is a good thing to teach but cannot really be measured, Weaver said.

Chaucer's Canterbury Tales

Starring Mickey O'Donoughue
New Vic Theatre of London

Friday, April 7 at 8 p.m.
McCain Auditorium
Kansas State University
General Public $18 Senior Citizen $16 Student $9

Join the lively, bawdy pilgrims on the local vicarage lawn for the finals of the annual Geoffrey Chaucer Storytelling Competition. Tales are told of love, lust and laughter. Some are traditional and visual; others are, in the funniest and most good humored way, a little less delicate. The New Vic's raunchy and rambunctious rendering is not perhaps one for purists, but is definitely one that would have Chaucer rolling in the aisles.

"Are they like Monty Python? Kind of, but not as cerebral. Are they more Benny Hill? No, their work is intellectually conceived but equallly crazed. . . .They are simply the best theatrical comedy group in the world today." (Bill Royston, The Philadelphia Inquirer)

This program is not suitable for children.

For tickets call 532-6428 or come to the McCain box office. Box office hours: noon to 5 p.m. weekdays; from 1 p.m. before weekend matinees; and from 5 p.m. before weekend evenings. Tickets are also available at the usual outlets.

CITY COMMMISSION

The Collegian asked candidates for Manhattan City Commision to answer what they will do to make students feel safe in Manhattan, improve the job market for college students, and what they will do to improve housing.

Text by Lisa Elliott

Steve Hall

Steve Hall said he has always been a strong advocate of campus safety.

"I questioned whether we should include money for the campus escort service in the City-University Projects Fund," Hall said.

Hall said because he used to work at K-State, he has a long tradition of looking out for the interests of the University.

"I'm really concerned with pedestrian safety, lighting and campus security," he said.

One problem point Hall mentioned is Manhattan Avenue. Hall said crossing that road can be like playing Russian roulette with cars.

Hall also said he sees people shifting jobs rather than new jobs being created in Manhattan.

"I would encourage any jobs that could be developed to increase job opportunities for students," he said.

Right now, Hall said he does not see any new opportunities coming along, but he said he hopes the economic development project will change that situation.

Hall said he thought the future of safe housing rested on the continued relations between the Landlords' Association, the city and the University.

Hall said two years ago he was instrumental in getting representatives from the three organizations together to address the issue of safe housing.

Although Hall said inspections were important in increasing safe housing, he said he does not support making inspections mandatory. He said he felt a voluntary system was better.

"We've got too much government now."

By making the inspections mandatory, another layer of bureaucracy would be established, he said.

Bruce Snead

Bruce Snead said he hoped students and year-round citizens of Manhattan could work together to create an atmosphere of caring and mutual support for safety and for each other.

Students first need to realize they play an important role in their safety by being honest and law-abiding citizens, he said. Then students can rely on the local law enforcement agencies to do their jobs, Snead said.

"We are all vulnerable at different times," Snead said.

He said he saw improved lighting as one way to ensure students and residents have a safe physical environment. Safety would be something the commission would continue to work and improve on, Snead said.

Snead said he would be open to hearing any suggestions from students and from year-round Manhattan residents on safety issues. Snead said he would be willing to work toward improving life for both.

"Improving access to jobs for college students means we'll need more jobs," Snead said.

To create jobs, the economy would need to expand or grow, and jobs would have to be imported, he said.

Although student jobs would not be on the high end of the pay scale because they are often odd-hour jobs or night jobs, he said he thought there would be more opportunity with the economic development of Manhattan.

"I can't create jobs for students. That has to come from demands for services," he said.

Snead said much of the responsibility for safe housing is the responsibility of the tenants.

"People who live in housing have to be responsible for their actions," he said.

Snead said he did not support mandatory housing inspections. Students and landlords should not be forced to keep housing safe, he said.

"Students and landlords have moved toward a voluntary system," he said.

Students and landlords have rights and responsibilities to each other, Snead said.

Ed Horne

Ed Horne said he thought some of the suggestions made to the city commission concerning safety measures such as improved lighting on and near campus should be looked into.

The safety measures would be funded through the fund created with the sales tax collected on campus, he said.

"I am fully in support of moving ahead as quickly as we can," Horne said.

Horne has two daughters who will be attending K-State next year. Both girls have part-time jobs, and Horne said he hoped the opportunity for employment would continue to be there for his daughters and all students.

Horne said he was excited about work on the economic development project funded with the half-cent sales tax for economic development.

As more experienced workers move up in the work force, more part-time jobs would become available to students, he said.

One of the big challenges facing the city commission is educating students about their rights as tenants, Horne said.

"We have to rely on the students to tell us when something is unsafe," he said.

The number of people the city would have to hire to create a regular inspection team would be astronomical, Horne said. The city doesn't have the resources to do it.

Horne said he thought it was important for the students to realize they can request an inspection. It is difficult to enforce city codes without being invited to do inspections, he said.

Justin Kastner

Justin Kastner said he thought he had helped the city commission address the safety issue while serving on the City-University Projects Fund Committee last fall.

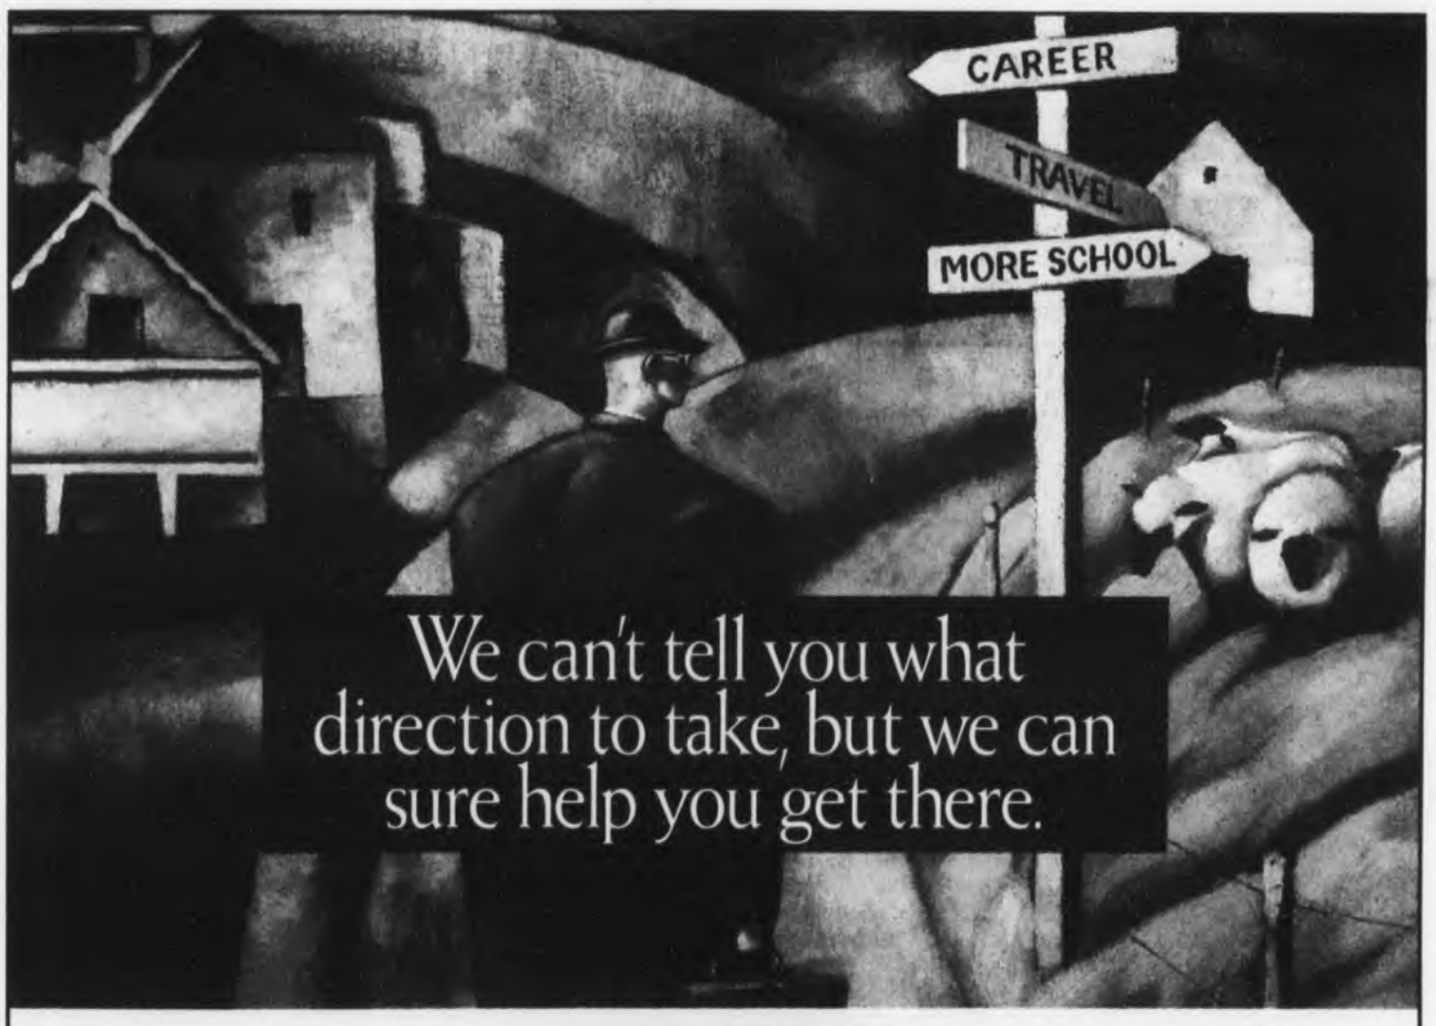
Kastner said it looked like the six recommendations made by the committee have been included in next year's city budget.

Two of those recommendations included better lighting around the perimeter of campus and an emergency-vehicle route through campus, Kastner said.

The improvements will be paid for with money generated from the tax revenue collected on campus since annexation last summer.

"I live immediately off campus, and I can see the need for lighting," he said.

With funds raised with the half-cent sales tax for economic development, Kastner said the commission would be trying to bring in new businesses and industries to boost the economy.



Kastner said one of the most important jobs of the commission is to communicate with the residents of Manhattan about services available.

The housing inspection service is one service few students know about or take advantage of, Kastner said.

Although the service is important for students, Kastner said he did not support making the inspections mandatory.

It would not be reasonable to include the service in the city budget because so many people would have to be hired to perform the service, he said.

"I think if students know they can have their place inspected, I think landlords will be incented to provide safe housing," Kastner said.

Resident feels banned from her own room

Dear Cassie,

My roommate has always stayed out late, often until two or three in the morning, but during the past several weeks, it's been much, much worse. She's not home when I leave in the morning. Obviously, this isn't any of my business. The problem is that she then proceeds to sleep all day long.

I live in a residence hall room, which is claustrophobic enough already, but having to keep the lights off and the shades shut all day is driving me nuts. I feel like I'm being banned from my own living room.

Cassie, what am I going to do? I don't want to be a bitch about this. I still have to live with her for a month and a half. How can I get out of this with a clear conscience and without a pissed-off roommate?

Sick and Tired

Dear Sick,

I think you should sit down and talk to her about this. There might be something causing all of this that is deeper than you realize.

If she is obnoxious about this whole thing, though, and there is no good excuse, I suggest you don't spare her feelings. Go about your business as you normally would.

Cassie

I need your letters.
My address is 116 Kedzie Hall

▶ LITERARY CONTEST

Submit your poems, fiction to win $50

MICHELLE BELCHER
Collegian

Polish up those writing skills.

The K-State literary magazine Touchstone is now accepting applications for an undergraduate-poems and short-stories contest.

The magazine Touchstone has been in existence at K-State for more than 30 years through the English department.

"It has student editors and student staff. This is unique because there are not many schools like this," Melissa Rodenbeek, co-editor of Touchstone, said.

Touchstone will be hiring new staff in the fall.

Undergraduate students from K-State can submit poems and short fiction into the Touchstone contest by April 12. Poems should be no longer than two pages, and short fiction should be no longer than 15 pages.

The winner of the poem and short fiction section will be announced at an awards ceremony in May. Winners will receive $50.

Submissions need to have a title sheet with the author's name, address and phone number. Entries can be dropped off in Denison 122. Students can submit either poetry, short fiction or both.

"We want writers of all levels of experience and background to enter. It is not just limited to English majors, but all department majors," Rodenbeek said.

Touchstone is published once a year in the spring. It is available at the English department and in Farrell Library.

"If someone is interested in submitting for the contest, they may want to look at a copy of the magazine from last year to get an idea of what gets published in the magazine," Rodenbeek said.

Undergraduate students not wanting to enter the contest may still submit work to go into next year's edition.

"Students can submit to the magazine by next fall. Undergraduates from other schools can also submit materials for the magazine," Rodenbeek said.

Touchstone will also be soliciting art in the fall for possible cover art and for inside of the magazine.

"We try to concentrate on K-State people for the magazine. We try to keep a significant amount of work by K-State in it. Since we are funded through the English department, we have a responsibility to K-State students first," Stacy Janicki, co-editor of Touchstone, said.

Janicki said undergraduates are the focus of this magazine, and no graduate work will be accepted.

"We enjoy seeing undergrads get published. It is nice to have on a résumé before you go to graduate school," Janicki said.

Rodenbeek said getting an article into the magazine is like a foot in the door.

"It is a good start for young writers, a way to get published. Undergraduates have a good opportunity with a good start," Rodenbeek said.

Brewery to offer specialty dishes even picking up promotion from KMKF-FM 101.5, better known as K-Rock.

But Russ Loub, new general manager, wants to try a new marketing strategy.

"I think as a general rule in the restaurant business, you either make it or break it by having quality food and quality service," he said.

"If those two items aren't your primary objectives, then you can't make that up with other things like entertainment."

Loub, who was previously general manager and executive chef at the Manhattan Country Club, said his primary concern is getting the bar and restaurant going.

"Your bread and butter in this business is people coming in to eat and drink," he said.

The bar is now in the process of metamorphosing into a new restaurant, and Loub hopes to target a family crowd to use his restaurant.

"It was our opinion that the previous owners focused probably too heavily on the student population and didn't do enough to reach other markets," he said.

With beer and hamburgers, the former Little Apple Brewery tried to appeal to students, he said, and it didn't have the reputation as a mid-scale restaurant such as Applebee's.

Mid- to upper-scale meals include those in the $8 to $15 range versus $10 and under, Loub said.

"We're coming in with a whole new menu. We've got a whole new line of beer, and a whole new focus on where would be our market," he said.

Loub said the new market will be attracted primarily by two factors: the microbrewery and the new kitchen menu.

One of the most obvious new characteristics of this mid-scale menu will be the addition of certified Angus beef.

Angus beef goes through a separate grading and handling process than that of its cousin, commodity beef, which is what you normally find at the supermarket.

"Angus beef is the premier product in the U.S. in terms of quality, marbling and texture — all these things," he said.

Seven types of the steak will be available, with sizes ranging from eight to 24 ounces. For Angus beef, you will pay more than you would for regular beef, up to 10 percent more.

Steve Loub, kitchen manager, said the new menu will also include fresh seafood, a 60- to 70-item salad bar and fresh vegetables.

"We've tried to not be too ordinary," he said. "We're trying to give people some things that maybe they can't get anywhere else."

Loub plans to offer fare such as Beer-beque sauce, beer-steamed bratwurst and ale-battered shrimp, just to name a few. Obviously, beer will play an important role in the new menu at the brewery.

Another difference between the old and the new Little Apple Brewery will be corporate-style management, Russ Loub said.

This corporate management will produce very consistent service, Russ Loub said.

"That's really the major effort we're going to make — developing that core group of employees and have a very corporate atmosphere," he said.

That task is being taken by Steve's wife, Tracy Loub, who will manage the restaurant/bar. She moved to Manhattan from Colorado, where she managed for Lone Star steak houses.

With changes in management, beer and menu items and marketing philosophy, the Little Apple Brewery will be different than it was before.

"I think the changes will surprise a lot of people — people that may have been here before and had a bad experience will give it a second chance," Steve Loub said. "I think people will be happily surprised."

Multimedia expected, appreciated

The instructor still has to be there, be knowledgeable, has to be enthusiastic about their subject and has to love teaching," Jennings said.

Another concern about multimedia is the lighting in the classroom.

"Control of lighting is one of the key things to multimedia. The biggest problem is control of lights and the quality of the image.

I have to watch the lights really close so I can get a sharp image on the screen but still have enough lights for the students to take notes. You have better control in a room with a dimmer switch," Jennings said.

One other concern of using it in the classroom is scrolling down the screen too fast for the students.

"It is tempting to go too fast for the students. I have learned to slow down and not to put too much information on the screen because if it is on the screen, students want to write it down," he said.

Jennings said he likes the remote mouse with the system because it gives the instructor freedom.

"Students right out of high school expect multimedia, and non-traditional students appreciate it and think it is great," he said.

"This is an evolving technology in hardware and software that is changing. It has allowed me to bring in a greater amount of information and have more ready access to it when I am teaching," he said.

"It takes a lot of work, but I feel my presentations are much better by enhancing the quality of the information I am able to bring and the ready access to it."

Legend says Earth based on 4 substances

"The story is not over. The story is continuing to be lived out. It is those of you sitting here of the seventh generation that are going to make the difference," she said.

Mann said there are sacred Native American ceremonies that renew life for all people on Earth.

"Someone has to, in view of the fact that we have desecrated and violated this Earth so much," Mann said.

Mann said a mountain in South Dakota called Bear Butte has been identified as a sacred mountain where Native Americans still go to fast. It is now in a state park, and the hiking trails there are not closed when Native Americans go there to fast, Mann said.

Mann said Bear Butte might not be the sacred mountain it is geographically identified as. There is possibly another mountain in Minnesota, which the legends say is so covered with trees it appears black.

"One of these days I hope to find that mountain, or that my son finds it so I, too, can journey," she said.

Mann described the four substances Cheyenne legend bases the Earth on.

The grandfather spirit made the world out of four substances: sinew, to provide strength to hold the world together; sweetgrass, the beginning of all vegetation; buffalo fat, the beginning of all animal life; and red earth paint, which is used in sacred ceremonies.

Mann said a Canadian company is proposing to mine gold on the sweetgrass hills of Montana. The predicted yield of gold from this mine will be enough gold to make 11 wedding bands and a few caps for people's teeth.

One audience member said she thought the speech was educational, especially in areas that are neglected at K-State.

"I thought it was very informative, about Native American spirituality and the respect we should have, and that is something we are lacking," said Barbara Baker, academic services coordinator of educational supportive services.

Baker said she was disappointed at the low turnout for such a good lecture.

"We need to encourage people to attend these lectures, and that's a way to gain respect," she said.

▶ CITY COMMISSION ELECTION

1 incumbent, 2 rookies elected

JILL TEGTMEIER
Collegian

About 100 votes separated the top three candidates who were elected to the city commission Tuesday.

Bruce Snead came out on top with 3,878 votes. Steve Hall received 3,777, and Justin Kastner received 3,678.

"I guess the same people voted for all of us," Hall said jokingly.

Hall said he was not surprised at how the elections turned out because there was not a burning issue to pull voters one way or another, which had happened in previous years.

He said he felt honored to be elected again and was pleased with how the election turned out.

Hall sat through a city commission meeting the entire time the votes were being tallied.

"That's just part of my responsibility. I have to take care of business first," he said.

"I will work very hard to deserve this office that the people gave to me," he said.

Hall said there will be a period of adjustment when the new commissioners assume office April 18.

"We will be getting acquainted, growing and learning how to work together. We all know one another, so it's not like a bunch of strangers having to work together," Hall said.

Hall said he thinks the voters wanted people they knew they could trust.

"They picked three people who they thought could work together and that they could trust," he said.

Snead could not be contacted for comment.

▶ SCHOOL BOARD ELECTION

Voters show support for current board

JILL TEGTMEIER
Collegian

A small group of candidates and supporters watched as the tallies of votes were written on a dry-erase board by a staff member of the county clerk's office.

The two candidates for the school board who were present, Mary Nichols and Deb Nuss, were both elected.

Larry Weaver and Joleen Hill were also elected to the school board.

Weaver said he was pleased with the outcome.

"This was the first time I've run a campaign, so I'm very happy at the outcome," Weaver said. "This is going to be a big job. I'm looking forward to working with the community and working for the schools."

Hill, an incumbent, also said the community is showing its support for the school board.

"This is a good reflection on how the community feels about how we're doing," Hill said. "I feel we have a good team that will be able to meet the challenges before us. I am pleased to be a part of that team."

Hill said she was also pleased by the school funding legislation passing in the Kansas Legislature, which she hopes will be signed by Gov. Bill Graves. The Local Option Budget will hopefully be able to be reduced, Hill said.

Hill said she was not present at the county building because she had just returned Tuesday evening from a meeting of the National Association of School Boards.

Nuss, a school board incumbent, said she was pleased with the outcome.

"The ranking shows support for the current board and what it's done," Nuss said. "We can always do better, but we are on the right track."

Nichols, also a school board

Sarah Weddington, attorney in the Roe v. Wade case, explains the components of the U.S. Supreme Court case during her speech in McCain Auditorium Tuesday night. The three components in the case were the right to privacy, whether pregnancy is fundamental and whether states have a compelling reason to regulate abortion. The court ruled 7-2 in favor of Roe to legalize abortion in the landmark decision 22 years ago.

Rewriting the law

A trip to the library 22 years ago led an inexperienced attorney to the halls of the U.S. Supreme Court.

story by shelly fogle

Sarah Weddington, attorney for the winning side of the 1973 Roe v. Wade case that legalized abortion, said the trial was her first contested case.

Weddington was scheduled to speak at K-State as part of Women's History Month, but her speech had to be rescheduled to Tuesday night because of scheduling conflicts.

Weddington, speaking at McCain Auditorium, said she was recruited in the early 1970s by a group of women counselors who wanted to give information to their clients on acceptable places to have illegal abortions.

The women wanted to know if they could give out that type of information, Weddington said.

Weddington researched the subject, eventually leading to her being the attorney in the landmark case.

"I thought the decision was written in concrete or granite. It is more like written in sandstone, and it could change," she said.

She said the age of the 22-year-old decision to legalize abortion is both its strength and weakness.

Weddington said Americans will not

K-State's Students for the Right to Life protested a speech on campus Tuesday night by the attorney who argued the winning side of Roe v. Wade.

Members of the group gathered outside McCain Auditorium before Sarah Weddington's speech to show their opposition to the Roe v. Wade decision.

About 15 protesters marched silently and carried signs that read, "One-third of a generation is dead because of Roe v. Wade."

Weddington was scheduled to speak at K-State as a part of Women's History Month, but her speech had to be rescheduled for Tuesday because of scheduling conflicts.

Members of the organization took advantage of the opportunity to come out and inform the public of their views on abortion.

"It's not fair to think she's a savior of women when her work has killed so many children," said Jenniffer Talkington, freshman undecided and president-elect of the group.

Clayton Umscheid stands in front of his childhood home on 322 Colorado Street, which is to be torn down to make way for the expanded Kansas Highway 177 bridge. Umscheid is not satisfied with the terms of the forced settlement from the Kansas Department of Transportation.

House makes way for the highway

MELISSA HOYT

This is one in a continuing series of stories looking at how the building of a bridge has affected people and businesses.

Eminent domain recently took a man's childhood home.

Clayton Umscheid said he is in a losing battle with the Kansas Department of Transportation.

Eminent domain, which allows government to seize land for public use, allowed the state to seize his property for the Kansas Highway 177 bridge project.

"There is no value for the memories of being raised in that house," Umscheid said.

Umscheid and his three brothers inherited the house when his father died in 1988.

"I purchased the house from my other three brothers so it could be kept in the family," Umscheid said.

But Umscheid no longer owns his house. KDOT has acquired the house through eminent domain.

The house, at 322 Colorado St., is in the way of the new K-177 bridge that is being built.

"They gave the guy next door the option to keep his house and move it. He took the money and ran," Umscheid said, "KDOT then sold the house for $1 in an auction. They wouldn't even give me the option to keep my house."

Vicki Harris, Universal Field Services, said KDOT did not give them the option to auction the house.

"KDOT said we could not auction the house," Harris said.

Umscheid said the house was one of the first houses built in Manhattan.

"Colorado used to be the main entrance into Manhattan, so it was in a prime location," Umscheid said.

In September 1990, Sheryll White published a report about the house and its historical significance.

"The residence has the greatest architectural significance on any of the inventoried in the impact area," the report said.

White used several maps, county tax records, real estate transactions and interviews with various residents of the neighborhood to form her report.

The report said the normal research tools were greatly lacking in Manhattan regarding the

Using the alias "Fred," a student called the talk show "A Purple Affair" Monday night and fabricated a story saying he had been attacked on the east side of campus Saturday night.

Jay Catherman, senior in marketing and business management, said although the idea to telephone the radio show initially came from student body presidential candidate Andy Tomb, Tomb was not aware of what the content of the call would be.

"I just did it," Catherman said.

The call came in the same night presidential and vice presidential candidates Andy and Mark Tomb were on the radio show.

Tomb said he was not aware at the time that the caller was Catherman.

"I didn't know it was him," Andy Tomb said. "I thought it was real."

Catherman said the idea to act as if he had been attacked was conceived at the time of the radio show. He said he wanted the candidates to address the issue of campus safety.

"At the beginning of the show, the host asked what issues he would bring up, and he mentioned campus safety, and that's kind of what I went by," Catherman said.

Catherman said he was just trying to be funny during the broadcast.

"He just asked me the day before just to call in and ask him a good question," Catherman said. "He didn't tell me to make anything up. I did it on my own."

Catherman said Tomb was not aware he was "Fred" until after the show.

"We were kind of joking around, saying what I'd say, but he didn't believe I would say it, and I didn't think so at the time either," he said.

Catherman said as far as he knows, the host thought it was real. As far as the listeners go, he said

▶ INSTANT BINGO TO RAISE MONEY FOR CHARITABLE ORGANIZATIONS

Instant bingo passed in Riley County Tuesday with a vote of 4,090 to 2,322.

Instant bingo is a form of bingo used to raise money by charitable organizations, Ilene Colbert, Riley County clerk, said.

It is a state issue that was voted on to be legalized by making it a constitutional amendment to the Kansas state constitution, Colbert said.

With 80 percent of the state's votes tabulated, instant bingo, also known as pull-tab, passed by a vote of 205,470 to 146,295. The tabulation included returns from 86 counties in Kansas.

The 58-percent margin favoring it held steady from when the earliest returns began coming in to the secretary of state's office.

It was the only statewide issue on the ballot for the odd-year municipal and school board elections.

The attorney general of Kansas ruled that instant bingo is illegal, Colbert said, so the state constitution must be amended to legalize it.

If instant bingo had not passed, it would have been discontinued in July 1996, Colbert said.

▶ CLINTON, DEMOCRATS FOCUS ON DEFICIT; REPUBLICANS WANT FEWER TAXES

WASHINGTON (AP) — On the eve of a showdown, House leaders worked Tuesday to coax rebellious Republicans into line behind tax-cut legislation, the last key item in the Contract With America. President Clinton called the measure too costly and said, "I think we need to focus on the deficit."

House Speaker Newt Gingrich countered that Republicans stand for "a lower deficit, less taxes and a smaller government."

Republican critics of the measure fell into two groups: one favoring curtailment of a proposed $500-per-child tax credit so fewer wealthy families would qualify; the other opposing a provision to have federal workers pay more into their retirement fund.

Several Republican sources, speaking on condition of anonymity, put the number of shaky GOP votes — those opposed or uncommitted — at 20 or so.

The GOP can suffer 12 defections and still prevail if, as expected, Democrats unanimously oppose it. Even so, several leadership aides predicted that the measure would pass.

▶ 26-YEAR-OLD MAN CONVICTED FOR FALL ATTEMPT ON PRESIDENT'S LIFE

WASHINGTON (AP) — Francisco Martin Duran, a Colorado upholsterer who raked the White House with semi-automatic rifle fire last fall, was convicted Tuesday of attempting to assassinate President Clinton.

In returning the guilty verdict, a federal court jury rejected Duran's insanity defense. He had claimed he was shooting at an evil mist hovering over the White House, but psychiatric experts disagreed about whether he was deranged.

Duran, 26, of Colorado Springs, Colo., faces a maximum sentence of life in prison on the attempted assassination conviction. U.S. District Judge Charles Richey set sentencing for June 29.

During the two-week trial, defense attorneys had argued that insanity drove Duran to pull the rifle from under his trench coat and open fire on the White House on Oct. 29, 1994, as dozens of tourists stood nearby.

▶ BLOODY SPOTS FOUND IN BRONCO

LOS ANGELES (AP) — The tan interior of O.J. Simpson's Bronco was stained with red and brown spots, a criminalist testified Tuesday as he gave jurors a meticulous accounting of every splatter and smear that might link Simpson to murder.

Standing before a display of photos, the expressionless Dennis Fung pointed again and again to stains found inside the white Ford Bronco prosecutors contend Simpson drove the night his ex-wife and her friend were slashed to death.

Fung listed eight stains in all, including those on the steering wheel, the driver's side interior wall, the center console, the instrument panel and the carpet.

Fung didn't immediately identify them as blood, although a prosecutor promised in opening statements that scientific tests would link the stains to the blood of Simpson and victims Nicole Brown Simpson and Ronald Goldman.

▶ SEPARATISTS ATTACK FILIPINO TOWN

ZAMBAONGA, Phillipines (AP) — About 200 Islamic separists attacked a southern Philippine town Tuesday, plundering banks and stores, burning buildings and fighting troops flown in to defend the town.

At least 100 people died and 30 more were injured before soldiers drove the rebels into the forest, military officials said.

President Fidel Ramos declared a state of emergency in Ipil, a town of 50,000 people on the island of Mindanao about 480 miles south of Manila, and put all troops on Mindanao on alert.

The government said the heavily armed men were members of Abu Sayyaf, a Muslim group fighting for a religious state in the southern Philippines.

The group has been linked to a plot to kill Pope John Paul II and blow up American airliners over the Pacific.

City Commissioner Justin Kastner, junior in food science, watches as the election results are posted at the courthouse Tuesday evening.

Kastner's priority will be Manhattan jobs

SARAH LUNDAY
Collegian

Justin Kastner wore the yellow tiles thin as he paced the second floor of the Riley County courthouse.

Although the junior in food science placed first in the city commission primaries, this time he said he was tense.

"I've been a wreck," Kastner said, trying to explain the condition of his nerves to a friend.

In the hour between his arrival to the courthouse and the final tallies, he paced to the water fountain half a dozen times, shook hands, called his mom at Java Espresso and Bakery, rocked on his heels and smiled.

At 8:35 p.m., the final tallies were written on a dry-erase board.

"Yes," Kastner said with a clinched fist and a smile.

Third place — just behind incumbent Steve Hall and winner Bruce Snead.

Snead won the race with 3,878 votes, Hall took second with 3,777 votes, and Kastner locked up third with 3,678 votes.

The 20-year-old student had hoped for a four-year term, but he said two years was a good deal.

The four-year terms went to the top two winners.

"That's a good finish," Kastner said.

And then, correcting himself, he said, "A great finish."

More than 70 supporters waited for Kastner to stride into Java, the official Kastner campaign headquarters.

In a short speech, he said it had been a positive campaign and asked everyone to look around.

"I owe you all a debt, forever," he said.

And then the tears came.

Hugging his mother, Rebecca, Kastner became what he would later call a wimp.

Kastner said he did not think people understood the responsibility he felt at that moment.

"You think about the types of things that make your life exciting, and I can say they happened in the school district and at K-State," he said.

Besides that, his father, Curtis, teaches animal science, and his older brother graduated from K-State, he said.

But now, Kastner said, he is energized and ready to step into his position on April 18.

Issues played a big part in Kastner's campaign, and he said a focus on diversifying the city's economy will be evident in his leadership.

"Manhattan, right now, relies heavily on K-State and Fort Riley for employment — that's not a secret," he said.

He said his specific game plan is to to bring informational and educational businesses into the community with the help of the Economic Development Opportunity Board.

"In Manhattan, we are in a situation where we need to take some risk for the future," he said.

Bernard Franklin, assistant dean of student life, said the people of Manhattan want fresh energy.

"The transition of young, bright minds coming into leadership with vigor and enthusiasm is great," he said.

Kastner also said he was excited to offer a unique perspective of youth to the city commission.

"I think it's safe to bet that I represent a pretty young group," he said.

Ryan O'Leary, a sophomore at Manhattan High School, said he thinks Kastner has a big concern for the youth in Manhattan.

"I think Justin, if anyone, can get things done for the youth," he said.

Also, Kastner said his election shows that K-State students are an integral part of our community.

Beth Hochberg, sophomore in pre-medicine, said she thinks Kastner will command more respect for the students through his leadership.

"I think he's going to promote K-State in the community," she said.

To help accomplish his goals for the city, Kastner said he will be cutting his class load down to 12 hours a semester and plans to graduate in May 1997.

Andy Davis, junior in business, said he thought it was exciting when Kastner decided to run for city commission, but he was leery.

"I thought maybe too many people would think he was too young," Davis said.

At the end of the day, Kastner said he was relieved that the election was over.

"This is a logical fit for me and Manhattan," he said.

37-percent voter turnout higher than expected

County clerk disappointed by low participation

KIMBERLY WISHART

Thirty-seven percent of the registered voters in Riley County turned out for the city commission and Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 School Board elections Tuesday, Ilene Colbert, Riley County clerk, said.

That is 8,625 of the 23,614 registered voters in Riley County.

"I had predicted about 35 percent," Colbert said. "I wish there had been a lot more, but I don't have the answer of how to get people out to vote."

In 1993, only 30 percent of the registered voters turned out to cast their ballots. The percentage of voters who turned out to vote in the primary election also increased this year.

"There were 24 percent of voters who turned out for the primaries," Jolene Campbell, county clerk employee, said. "Our general-election turnout was pretty average compared to the state."

There were about 115 workers handing out ballots and assisting voters for 12 hours at the 28 polls available in Manhattan.

"Every voter in the county had the opportunity to vote on something," Colbert said.

Philip Breitmeyer, who worked the polls at the Woodrow Wilson Elementary School, said there was a steady flow of voters all day.

"There seemed to be twice as many people as came out for the primaries," Breitmeyer said. "Quite a few people showed up from the outlying districts who were only able to vote for school board members. That was pretty surprising."

Kay Ring, who worked at Woodrow Wilson with Breitmeyer, said they only had a little bit of confusion.

"There was some confusion about where to vote, like which side of the ballot," she said. "A lot of people didn't know about the bingo issue either."

Colbert said many people probably did not know about the instant bingo issue, which passed with 4,090 votes.

Voters in USD 383 might get the chance to vote at another election this summer, Colbert said.

The school district has discussed a Local Options Budget, which would mean an estimated 12-percent increase in property taxes if it is implemented.

The voters have a right to take the tax increase to a public vote. In order to force a vote, 5 percent of the registered voters must sign a petition.

"There had to be about 924 signers on this petition, and about 1,900 signed the petition to vote on the budget," Colbert said. "They have 30 days to tell me if they want to have an election. After that, it dies, and they can't bring it up again."

incumbent, said the community is showing its support for the current board.

"The results show that people appreciate the work that the incumbents have done," Nichols said.

She said she paid only $100 for her campaign, so the voters voted her in out of support for what the board has done.

Mike Pearson said he was pleased with the outcome despite losing.

Pearson came in fifth in the race.

"I'm a little disappointed since I didn't win, but I did pretty well after being an unknown six to eight weeks ago," Pearson said.

Mary Hampton said although she is disappointed at the results of the election, she is glad she ran.

"I believe I brought out certain issues," Hampton said.

"We will continue the process of informing school patrons. You haven't seen the last of me," she said.

Incumbents elected to BSU

BSU plans to become a strong campus voice

STEVEN YOUNG
Collegian

New officers were elected for Black Student Union at its Tuesday night meeting. The officers' terms will begin in the fall semester.

Political chair was the only position contested. Syvette Davis, junior in social science, and Mike Bell, freshman in environmental design, tied for the office.

There was no runoff election. Davis was declared the social chair after Bell declined to accept the position. Nominated candidates swept the election of other positions.

President Jawwad Abdulhaqq, sophomore in political science and incumbent president of BSU, was re-elected.

Abdulhaqq said each and every new officer should be a strong asset to BSU.

"I think it's going to be an exciting and a powerful year for BSU," he said.

The new officers have had the advantage of seeing BSU in its finest moments, Abdulhaqq said.

Among the things BSU hopes to do next year is become a stronger voice on the K-State campus, Abdulhaqq said.

BSU has worked this year on strengthening its status on campus, he said.

"I am perfectly confident that BSU is recognized as a powerful force on the campus," Abdulhaqq said.

BSU hopes to increase its activity in politics from the campus to the national level, Davis said.

Recently, BSU participated in a protest of the Contract With America. Next year, BSU expects to actively endorse a candidate for president, Davis said.

"I cannot say we will make posters," Davis said. "But we may have a political-awareness table where we could tell who we support."

Another specific goal of the group for next year will be the recruitment of African Americans to K-State and the retention of those students, Abdulhaqq said.

"We think BSU should be No. 1 in that effort, but we will accept help from anywhere," he said.

BSU endorses candidates

The Black Student Union is endorsing the Liz Ring and Paul Friedrichs ticket for student body president and vice president.

Three pairs of candidates for student body president and vice president spoke to BSU Tuesday night in the Union 207. The three tickets that spoke at the meeting were Liz Ring and Paul Friedrichs; Andrew Tomb and Mark Tomb; and Jeff Peterson and Brad Finkeldei.

After a short debate, BSU chose to endorse Ring and Friedrichs for a number of reasons.

"Liz Ring has always supported the Black Student Union, and she is a candidate that will respect our views as well as other students'," Syvette Davis, junior in social science, said.

Recently, the Student Governing Association has made progress with BSU and experienced setbacks with BSU, Davis said.

"In the past four years that I have attended K-State, I have seen the SGA make changes to serve the BSU, and I have also felt that sometimes they rejected the BSU on certain issues," she said.

Davis said BSU wants representatives who will make a difference and make changes to better serve all students.

"All of the points that Ring and Friedrichs have will positively affect all of the students at K-State," Davis said.

In the eyes of BSU, Ring and Friedrichs will represent BSU and K-State well.

Davis said Ring and Friedrichs have the best plans for K-State and will initiate those ideas if elected.

Charita Vine, sophomore in psychology, said she is looking for candidates who will do more than just discuss campus problems.

"What this student body needs is someone who will effectively change things with the status quo and not just point out that there is a problem," Vine said.

"We want someone who will actually change things," she said.

While serving on Student Senate for the College of Arts and Sciences, Liz Ring has been there for BSU, Shanta Bailey, graduate student in psychology, said.

"Liz has done a lot to advance the cause of BSU," Bailey said. "We believe that she is concerned with issues that affect us."

While serving on Student Senate, Ring has always supported minority groups around campus, Jawwad Abdulhaqq, sophomore in political science, said.

"Liz has been a strong supporter of BSU during the allocations process at Student Senate," Abdulhaqq said.

Ring and Friedrichs want to recognize all of the groups on campus, he said.

"I would like to see BSU get the recognition of an organization that executes programs that enhances the cultural diversities on campus," Abdulhaqq said. "I feel Ring and Friedrichs will go to bat for all students in general."

IN OUR OPINION

by the Collegian Editorial Board

Metazine proposal deserves reconsideration

Regardless of there being legitimate reasons to deny funding to Metazine, the Tribunal should ask Senate to reconsider the proposal with all notions of censorship aside.

Censorship is bad.

A precedent of censorship is even worse.

Whether or not Student Senate's decision to deny $150 to the magazine Metazine is an act of censorship is impossible to determine, but if there's a chance it is, then the funding should be re-evaluated.

During discussion of the funding, two senators made comments about the magazine's content, which included nudity, that were ruled out of order by Clayton Wheeler, the Senate chair.

In addition, concerns were brought up about Metazine's intention to use Senate allocations for fundraising and not return the money.

Student Tribunal is reviewing the case for the possibility of censorship and will make a decision within the next seven school days.

Regardless of there being legitimate reasons to deny funding to Metazine, the Tribunal should ask Senate to reconsider the proposal with all notions of censorship aside.

Even if only two senators voted against funding for Metazine because of reasons of content, there is a legitimate concern about how this could influence future votes.

Candidates promise honesty, positive changes for the future

Editor's note: This is the third of a five-column series written by the student body presidential and vice presidential candidates. It is meant to give the candidates an opportunity to share their concerns and platforms in-depth. The columns will run daily in the order that the candidates will appear on the ballots.

We are ready to roll up our sleeves to work with you.

We have the energy and experience necessary to get the job done for you. We would like to be your next student body president and vice president. We decided to announce in the heart of the K-State campus. We felt it was important to announce on this campus because it symbolizes our commitment to this University and to the students of this University. We are ready, and we hope you will join us to prepare for a new direction.

LIZ RING

PAUL FRIEDRICHS

Let us talk a little about the style of our campaign, which we feel reflects our style of leadership. We are committed to running an honest, positive and ethical campaign, and we challenge our opponents to strive for these high standards. We are open, approachable and willing to listen to your concerns and input. Last of all, we want to have fun with this campaign, and we feel that is reflected in our personalities.

Our platform is focused on three main areas:

1. student empowerment
2. positive change
3. fiscal responsibility

Student empowerment encompasses points that will open up more opportunities for student input. Some examples are having a student sit on the Kansas Board of Regents so our voice can be heard. It's done in other states; it should be done here.

Second, we would like to continue to have more on-campus and off-campus forums on important issues affecting students.

Third, we will establish focus groups and round tables to act as sounding or advisory boards, which could be made up of college council presidents or club leaders to give us vitally needed feedback, suggestions and input. We will work on establishing good relations with the city because of recent annexation. Student government needs to be responsive and proactive in dealing with city issues that affect K-State students, such as safe housing and pedestrian crossings.

Positive change encompasses a variety of issues that we feel can make quick and effective changes. We'd like to discuss five priorities we feel we would work hard to accomplish quickly.

1. P.E. Requirement. We feel that the P.E. requirement needs to be restructured to allow substitution of other classes such as volleyball, riflery, lacrosse, ROTC or weight lifting.

2. Campus safety. We would like to see the police be more visible on campus. Why not have them make walking patrols, day and night, instead of unsuccessful bike patrols and driving around the perimeter of campus? This would ensure a more visible, accessible and secure feeling while on campus. Also, we would like to see expansion of the escort service to serve off campus. Finally, we will make it a priority to install inexpensive phones in each building that will call on and off campus in order to allow all students to take advantage of these services.

3. Parking. First, we support continuing efforts to make the campus more bicycle-friendly. The campus needs to have more bike paths, trails and racks. Next, we believe that there should be a reduction in the number of reserved stalls for campus vehicles. They could be moved to an outer lot, thereby opening up valuable, precious, needed spaces on campus.

4. Teaching evaluations and minors. These are wonderful proposals that need the wind back in their sails. We realize the importance of increasing the value of teacher evaluations and tenure and promotion decisions. We also see a very strong need for students to have access to the results of teacher evaluations. The minors program has been allowed to lose momentum. We will push for implementation of minors programs in all colleges and departments.

5. Executive initiation. We believe it is the duty of the executive branch to stimulate, propose and encourage discussion and debate within the Student Senate. We will propose legislation to foster these debates and forge solutions so that student concerns are heard and responded to.

The third area is fiscal responsibility. We are firmly opposed to the dangerous trend of University administration imposing special fees on the students without their consent. A few examples of special fees recently proposed are a bicycle-registration fee, a graduation fee and an international student fee. These fees not only dip into the students' pockets but double-charge them for services that should be provided with basic tuition.

Again, we believe that a student representative should sit on the Kansas Board of Regents. A student voice is needed when the Board of Regents considers fees and tuition issues. This is done in other states, why not here in Kansas?

We will conduct vigorous lobbying efforts both on the state level and with a new focus on the local and community levels. As a result of the annexation, city and local issues are far too important to ignore.

We are excited about this campaign. We feel we are in touch with the pulse of the student body. We are ready to roll up our sleeves and start working for you today. Don't forget to exercise your right to vote April 11 and 12 in the K-State Union, and we hope you will join us in our endeavor to set K-State in a new direction.

Good hangouts in Manhattan worth the search

SCOTT ALLEN MILLER

Manhattan may not have the Great Pyramids of Giza or the Leaning Tower of Pisa, but there are some cool places to hang out. This is a list of my top 10 favorite places to be in the area (in no specific order). If you go there, I'll see you there soon. If not, maybe you'd enjoy trying some of them out.

Honorable mention — Long John Silver's Sea Food Shoppe. Long John's has (arguably) the best fries and the fastest drive-thru service in town. Also, as a person recently pointed out on the ksu.talk.drivel newsgroup, Long John's has a lot of food that is crispy golden on the outside and soft and white on the inside. Who knows why? This only gets an honorable mention because I usually only drive through.

10) Espresso Royale Caffe. This was one of the first places I ever visited in Manhattan. Espresso Royale has some keen competition around the corner now, which is good for Manhattan-area coffee lovers. Espresso Royale has great drinks, clever eats and a relaxed atmosphere. The only time I don't like it is when someone decided to occupy a table all through the Sunday morning rush while not drinking anything. I didn't say the clientele were always considerate, did I?

9) The Konza Prairie. You can't beat nature at its finest. Even after seeing most of the 50 states, the Flint Hills area of Kansas is among the most stunning yet subtle land formations I've ever seen. The Konza is a beautiful place to enjoy the land that God has blessed us with as well as the other beautiful creatures God has challenged us to live with.

8) Bluemont Hill. It's not just a place to get a sexually-transmitted disease — it's also a park. This place is open from 6 a.m. to 11 p.m. to go and hang out. The cops will harass you if you go at any other time, although people do it quite a lot anyway. Prepare to get the alignment on your car fixed after driving on the so-called pavement there. Also, don't litter the Hill. It's beginning to look like New Jersey. Remember, your mother (nature) does live here.

7) Bob's Diner. Whether you're coming home from the bars or getting ready to go to class — or, as is sometimes my case, both — Bob's is the place to be.

Unlike other franchised restaurants, Bob's is a locally owned, working-class joint that can serve you almost any kind of down-home cooking you want. The prices are reasonable, too. This is definitely the cheap, stick-to-your-ribs eats place in town.

6) Rock-A-Belly Bar & Deli. Even though I don't tip worth a squat, I always get good stuff to drink at this place. Their food isn't too bad, either. If you're younger than 21, you will not be able to enjoy their big beers or (my favorite) big red beers (beer with tomato juice). Red beer rules. You can also get a sloe gin martini that will look, taste and smell just like Vicks 44D cough syrup. Who wouldn't like that? On top of it all, they have a pretty diverse clientele.

5) Snookie's Bar. This is the best place for live music in town. Snookie's always has the best bands around.

4) Top of the World. This is another high-altitude place to check stuff out. It overlooks Manhattan as well as Tuttle Creek Dam. It's windy, but it's a great perch from which to observe your world.

The only problem is that it's not technically open to the public, so you might get booted out if you go up there.

3) K-State's computer labs. K-State has some pretty amazing stuff in these labs. If you have a modem and a computer where you live, you may be able to use hook up with K-State's computer network from your own room. Want to read the bills before Congress? Want to correspond with old high-school friends? Want to read this newspaper on a computer? Want to play video games instead of study? They're all unbelievably easy to do. Just contact Computing and Network Services for more information.

2) First Congregational United Church of Christ. OK, OK. I haven't gone to church in a while, but this is the church that I haven't been going to, if that makes any sense. If you're looking for an accepting, non-judgmental, loving community in which to spend your Easter, check them out.

The minister, Rev. Don Longbottom, also conducts Bible studies on campus every Tuesday. He's a great minister, but I hear he's a punk on the basketball court.

1) The K-State Collegian. Although some people at this paper deserve to be slapped with an ugly stick, this is a great organization to belong to. Sure, the equipment only works half of the time, and the place is only cleaned at the equinoxes, but that's part of it.

If you want to have a part-time-paying full-time job with people who are nuttier than you are (for at least your first semester, anyway), apply for this summer and/or this fall's staff.

It's important to have places where you feel your best. Get out and find them.

You can be anybody you want to be — for a few bucks

KADY MASSEY

Quick. List all the things that you have to show a picture identification for before you can do them.

Ready?

I came up with: apply for a driver's license, leave the hospital after being born, apply for a passport, vote, enroll in school (any level), join the military, go to a bar, sell plasma and open a checking account.

Last Friday, I went to a local bank to open a new checking account with my husband-to-be. After showing the nice lady our driver's licenses, telling her what we both do (and don't do) for a living, how much we make, and disclosing our mothers' maiden names, we were granted permission to store our money in their hallowed institution. The whole process took about 25 to 30 minutes.

Afterwards, we went down the street to find out what it takes to get a marriage license — surprisingly little, we discovered.

We wandered into the courthouse and found the clerk of the court. I asked what it would take to get the license, fully expecting to be handed a list that requested at least three forms of ID and a blood test. Instead, we were given a form to fill out. After we both raised our right hands and swore we weren't Adolf Hitler and Eva Braun, the even nicer lady told us to come back Monday with $40. The time from we went into the office until we were back on the sidewalk was right around five minutes.

Out on the sidewalk, we stared at each other in bewilderment.

"Boy, that was easy," Darren said on the way back to the car. "Getting cable TV was harder than that. The wait was longer."

"Yeah, we could have claimed to be anybody. No wonder Las Vegas makes such a killing doing this," I replied.

What happened to the blood test? How come no one wanted to see my birth certificate? Why is everyone so quick to believe I'm who I say I am?

I find it very interesting that a bank is more selective in whom they let use their facilities than a county courthouse is in whom they let get married. What sort of indication is this of the priorities in this state? We can all be joined in holy matrimony, but if we're not careful, we'll have to keep our money in a sock?

After we both raised our right hands and swore we weren't Adolf Hitler and Eva Braun, the even nicer lady told us to come back Monday with $40.

I've always viewed the long lengthy process of paperwork as an opportunity to get out. If, for any reason, anyone changes their mind, all they have to do is refuse to sign something, and the whole chain stops right there. Convenient, simple, embarrassment-free.

Perhaps I'm just paranoid, but I believe the amount of paperwork should directly correspond with how life-altering the event is. Joining any branch of the military requires signing everything from consent forms on through to verifying your shoe size. Opening a checking account should not be a big deal, nor should registering to vote. Getting married should be a big deal.

I've been told that in Kansas all it takes to be common-law married is to claim that you are while in front of two witnesses. Anyone who would care to confirm or deny that is perfectly welcome; I wouldn't be too surprised if it were true.

I haven't bothered to look it up. It sounds like one of those laws prohibiting weird stuff like eating ice cream on Sundays or taking baths after midnight.

The simple fact that two very different activities required such opposite information is kind of amusing and also a little strange.

Mostly, I'm curious about why in a mere three days, over a weekend, I can claim to be anyone and marry whomever I please, but I have to wait three weeks for my new ATM card.

DELTA SIGMA PHI RUSHES TO SOLVE A

MURDER MYSTERY

STORY BY KIMBERLY HEFLING

PHOTOS BY PATRICK REILLY

Alex Dean, sophomore in chemical engineering, and Brian Long, freshman in English, accuse another player of being guilty of murder during Delta Sigma Phi's annual Murder Mystery Rush Party Saturday night.

HOT TUB PARTIES, PAINT WARS AND EVEN SUMO WRESTLING WERE SOME OF THE OPEN HOUSE RUSH ACTIVITIES SATURDAY AT K-STATE FRATERNITIES.

For many houses, Open House provided an opportunity to invite prospective members to the house for rush parties or informal tours.

Saturday's rush activities at the Sigma Nu fraternity consisted of sumo wrestling with special suits, a moon walk, basketball and volleyball, Jeff Deardorff, rush chairman, said.

Deardorff said the sumo-wrestling suits were a success.

"It was definitely a good thing to have," he said. "We got a lot of laughs."

Deardorff said during Open House, people who are rushing tend to ask social questions, whereas the parents tend to ask more scholastic questions.

"I think it's important for the parents to see where their son is going to be living and where they're investing money and their son's time," he said. "They also get a feel for the guys in the house."

Deardorff said a successful rush is important for the future of a fraternity.

"Rush is what keeps your house alive," he said. "If you have a bad rush year, numbers go down. We hold rush to be one of the most important events of the year. If you have a poor rush, it definitely affects you in long run."

Deardorff said although the Sigma Nu house tries to get a certain number of new members each year, it is not emphasized.

"We don't rush for numbers. We rush for quality individuals," he said.

The Beta Sigma Psi fraternity's rush party Saturday included an afternoon of paint war at Crazy Chris' and an evening of videos, Nathan Sherwood, a member of the fraternity, said.

Sherwood said he thought everybody had a good time, and nobody left the weekend disappointed.

Rush parties get people enthusiastic about college, Sherwood said.

"It gets them excited about it," he said. "They want to see campus, but classes themselves don't attract them. When you're with a group of people, it's easy to get excited."

Sherwood said he heard several of the men say they couldn't wait to get to college.

Sherwood said at times it is difficult to find rushees because Beta Sig is an all-Lutheran fraternity. To find rushees, Sherwood said the house sends letters to churches in the state.

"It's important to keep numbers up and keep people interested," he said.

Scott VanLeeuwen, Delta Upsilon rush chairman, said the DUs did not have an actual rush party for Open House, but their house was open for tours. VanLeeuwen said in the past the fraternity had rush parties on the day of K-State's Open House, but they found that rush parties for the fraternity are more successful on different dates.

"Parties are mainly for rushees to get to know members of the house," he said. "They can come over any time to see the actual structure, but during parties they can get to know and become more comfortable with the guys.

"We feel that the men in the house make the house and not the house itself," he said.

VanLeeuwen said a significant aspect of rush parties consists of selling actual greek life.

"We talk about the benefits of greek life that you wouldn't get in the dorms," he said. "Socially, you meet more people. Academically, we show them members of greek organizations have higher GPAs than people who don't."

> "WE FEEL THAT THE MEN IN THE HOUSE MAKE THE HOUSE AND NOT THE HOUSE ITSELF."
> SCOTT VANLEEUWEN
> Delta Upsilon rush chairman

The Alpha Gamma Rho fraternity had a barbecue and hot-tub party for rushees, Phil Schamberger, member of the AGR fraternity, said.

Schamberger said rush parties are an opportunity to sit down one-on-one to discuss the different aspects of the house with the people who are rushing.

"It's a chance to meet everyone else and give info about the house," Schamberger said. "I think most guys realize living here is more down-to-earth than they thought before getting here."

Kappa Sigma's activities on Saturday included a barbecue and house tours, Tad Ruliffson, rush chairman, said.

Ruliffson said his fraternity tries to emphasize the positive aspects of fraternity life to the people who are rushing.

"We show how fraternity life is good for your social life as compared to other housing and give price comparisons," Ruliffson said. "We also give them a tour of the house and show them recent improvements and show them how our house is in fairly good condition."

"It's a lot more effective to get a lot of guys over here at one time as compared to individually," Ruliffson said. "That way we can call ahead and have all the rush guests meet all the guys in the house."

Ryan Mitchell, rush chairman at the Phi Gamma Delta fraternity, said the fraternity did not have a rush party on Saturday because it was the day of an annual pig roast for alumni, but they did have a booth set up in the K-State Union and gave impromptu tours of the house.

Mitchell said it's difficult to sell the fraternity house in the shape it's in, but they can tell people who are rushing about renovations being made to the house this summer and about a new wing being built in fall 1996.

"Even though you're supposed to ignore it, it's still a good asset," Mitchell said. "Rushees come from their parents' house, which is usually pretty nice, and they don't want to go straight to Animal House."

Mitchell said the fraternity works to emphasize the positive aspects of their house.

"The big thing we promote about our house is that we do have a lot of hospitality," he said. "If you come to our house, we're not going to blow you off. You'll be greeted at the door."

Jeff Wilcox, president of the Phi Kappa Theta fraternity, said it's important to sell college life to people who are rushing.

"We first try to sell K-State and then try to sell the greek system as a whole," Wilcox said. "We then try to sell our own fraternity."

Wilcox said activities at the Phi Kap house Saturday included basketball, dinner and a poker and pool tournament.

Jason Otke, past rush chairman of the Pi Kappa Phi fraternity, said people who are rushing usually ask questions related to cost, social and intramural activities and about the type of interests in students in the house at rush parties.

The Pi Kaps had a barbecue and Open House for the people who were rushing.

"Open house gives incoming freshmen a chance to know the members and get to look at the house itself to see how clean or dirty it is," Otke said.

Otke said Open House also provides a chance for parents to get acquainted with the housemom and members.

"They have questions also, usually more than the rushees do," he said. "It helps if they know where their money is going to be going."

FarmHouse fraternity had a promotional display in the Union and gave tours of the houses, Brad Parker, rush chairman, said.

"It's a good chance to get our name out to people who maybe wouldn't be exposed to our fraternity in any other way," he said. "This way, they have the opportunity to come find us."

Parker said the people who are rushing usually ask questions about how FarmHouse is different from other fraternities and about cost comparisons of living in the house.

Members and guests of Delta Sigma Phi vote on who committed the murder during the Murder Mystery Rush Party Saturday night. Fraternity members invite friends from their high schools and visitors from Open House to the rush party in the evening.

6 recommendations adopted for ADA

JILL TEGTMEIER
Collegian

Debate of Americans with Disabilities Act recommendations prompted raised voices at the Manhattan City Commission meeting Tuesday night.

The commission received recommendations from the Human Rights and Services Board to adopt six ideas presented by public comments. All six were adopted.

The ideas adopted included things like five-minute breaks during public meetings, making audio tapes of public meetings available and allowing drinks in non-spillable containers to be brought to public meetings for individuals who need to regularly consume liquids for health reasons.

Public comments were heard from several individuals, including Vicki Tyler, wife of Lewis "Tobie" Tyler, who brought a lawsuit against the city for noncompliance with the Americans with Disabilities Act.

"None of my comments were reviewed by the city, and Tobie's verbal comments were also not included in the ADA Self-Evaluation Plan," she said.

"We were the only two people who made comments that weren't reviewed, evaluated and passed on as recommendations to the commission," Tyler said.

Ron Fehr, assistant city manager, said the Tylers' comments would be part of the appendix in the self-evaluation plan.

"We're coming to you to get your attention because there is a problem with staff relations with a select public," Delesa Rhodeman, Manhattan resident, said.

Tyler said it was clear to her that people were being discriminated against.

"We will not stand for this treatment. It is wrong and illegal. We have two choices of people to go to — the commission or the court. We're coming to you," Tyler said.

Mayor Helen Cooper said if everyone can take the chips off their shoulders and start fresh, everyone could get to the place they want to be.

"I would like to make an appeal for us to sit down at the table and talk," Edith Stunkel, city commissioner, said.

The commission also passed a grant-fund request of about $151,000 to the Manhattan Emergency Shelter Grant program. This is the first Emergency Shelter Grant program of a preventative nature authorized in Manhattan.

The commission also instructed Ken Ebert Associates to continue with the design of a new ball field.

Dwight D. Eisenhower Middle School will be the site for a $400,000 competition ball field, which should be completed by next year.

The commission selected this site and decided a single-competition ball field would be constructed, but they also decided to plan for an entire complex by purchasing 10 extra acres. There is still discussion about how the field will be financed.

Fund reduction stirs debate

Less enrollment in state schools prompts discussions

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Senators and House members could not agree Tuesday on whether to reduce funding of state universities.

Declining enrollments and the decision of whether to reduce the size of the state's Property Valuation Division prompted the debate.

Negotiations by joint conference committees on most of the next state budget continued for the second day. Members did agree on the future of state agencies that consider discrimination complaints and represent consumers in utility rate cases.

However, senators and representatives remained far apart on important budget issues.

Two of the most contentious have proven to be spending on the Property Valuation Division, or PVD, and Kansas Board of Regents universities.

House members want to remove $5.8 million from state university budgets for the state's fiscal year that begins July 1. The decrease reflects declining student enrollments on regents' campuses.

Because of the lower enrollments, the universities expect to collect less tuition revenues. Gov. Bill Graves had proposed replacing the lost tuition revenue with state tax dollars, and the Senate endorsed his proposal.

Senators wanted to discuss other items in the regents' budget and then decide how to handle the $5.8 million decrease. House members wanted to take the opposite tack and discuss the $5.8-million decrease first.

The entire budget for the state Board of Regents system is about $1.2 billion. It is the third-biggest appropriation, with the Department of Education receiving $2 billion and the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services, $1.55 billion.

"We need to talk about this budget as a whole," said Rep. Robin Jennison, R-Healy, chairman of the House Appropriations Committee.

Equally difficult was the question of jobs at PVD, under fire from House members for its handling of agricultural land appraisals. Some House members accuse PVD, which has more than 100 workers, of harassing county officials.

The House approved a proposal to eliminate 22 PVD jobs on July 1. Senators wanted to delay the cut, and keep all of the salary money on hand, some of it to allow the state to contract for services.

Senators noted that the state is under a Shawnee County District Court order to improve the appraisal of property statewide.

"We could have a problem," Sen. Gus Bogina, R-Shawnee, chairman of the Senate Ways and Means Committee, said of the House's proposal.

Another budget conference committee agreed to keep the Citizens' Utility Ratepayers Board alive another year.

The House had proposed eliminating all funds for the CURB, effectively abolishing the agency. Some House members believe CURB represents a duplication of work best handled by the Kansas Corporation Commission.

The Senate had rejected the House's proposal. Instead, it included $319,299 in an appropriations bill for the agency.

Jennison said House members wanted to air their concerns about CURB and agreed to the Senate's proposal.

"If you want to eliminate CURB, do it by statute, not by cutting off their money," Bogina said.

Negotiators also agreed on a proposed budget for the state Human Rights Commission.

The House has proposed cutting 23 positions from the commission's staff and using most of the money saved for mediation services. Senators rejected the idea and added back the 23 jobs, arguing that the commission needs the positions because of a backlog of cases.

The conference committee agreed to cut five jobs and make about $203,000 available to allow the agency to contract with an outside entity to provide mediation services.

"We believe it needs help," Bogina said. "We need to do something more than just choking it to death."

Forest fire forces residents from homes

ASSOCIATED PRESS

MANCHESTER TOWNSHIP, N.J. — A forest fire that began on state land in southeastern New Jersey spread quickly over 15,000 acres Tuesday, forcing several hundred people to flee their homes for part of the day.

Workers at the Popcorn Park Zoo in Forked River took home about 45 cats, dogs and birds. Other animals — one elephant, two lions, three bears, four ponies, six cougars and some monkeys — were left behind with a promise that firefighters would try to protect them.

The fire began shortly after noon in the Greenwood Forest Fish and Wildlife Management Area in Ocean County and was pushed north and east by high winds.

An afternoon shift in the wind sent flames south through unpopulated pine woods. No damage to homes and no injuries were reported by Tuesday night, and the evacuated residents were allowed to return home at 9 p.m.

Earlier, about 200 people were evacuated from homes in Manchester Township, said Donna Flynn, spokeswoman for the Ocean County Office of Emergency Management. Residents were taken to the Whiting fire house and elementary school, where students were kept inside for safety, police Lt. Wayne McGregor said.

About 200 people who live on the west side of Bamber Lake also were evacuated, said Sgt. Gerald Grappo of the Lacey Township police.

Gathered around their station wagon in the parking lot of the evacuation center under clouds of smoke that obscured the sun were Nancy Pustae, 41, her three children and their pets — a goat, a lamb, four rabbits and two ducks.

Pustae said she hoped firefighters would keep her Bamber Lake home from danger.

"They're doing the best they can. That's all we can hope for," she said.

"When you have 65 mile-an-hour winds and the amount of fuel that's out there, there's just no stopping it," said Don Knauer, a district warden with the state Forest Fire Service.

Assistant state fire warden Joe Hughes said the Forest Fire Service had over 100 firefighters with 30 trucks and two tanker aircraft battling the blaze. They were aided by 200 firefighers from volunteer companies.

At nightfall, firefighters set "back fires" along a 10-mile stretch of the Garden State Parkway — the main north-south coastal route — and its southbound lanes were closed, said Burt Plante of the state Forest Fire Service. Controlled back fires are designed to slow or stop the fire by eliminating the fuel that lies in its path.

Professor speaks of locating MIAs

ANNE HAZLETT
Collegian

Twenty-five years ago, five American soldiers were dropped into a rice paddy in Vietnam never to be seen alive again.

Michael Finnegan, professor of anthropology and a forensic anthropology consultant, described his experience excavating the soldiers' remains to students and faculty Tuesday at the Ramada Inn.

"After 25 years in very acidic conditions, all that remained of these men were a belt buckle, a boot and 86 teeth," he said.

Finnegan said he was told the soldiers were dropped out of a helicopter to set up an observation post. When they didn't report the next day, a search team was sent out.

"The team found two of the soldiers in hasty graves," he said. "Our job 25 years later was to find the other three."

Finnegan said at the time of his search team's departure, no foot soldier graves had been found in Vietnam.

"We had been digging for several days with no success when a member of the local community came forward and said he had been present at the soldier's burial," he said. "On the last day of our excavation, we came down on the shoulder of one of the individuals."

Finnegan

Finnegan said positive identification of the men has been slower than expected.

"We don't have the records we thought we had," he said.

"At the time of the excavation, we thought positive identification would be possible in a matter of weeks," Finnegan said.

A positive identification of the soldiers might be possible in the near future however, Finnegan said.

"We are experimenting with using a strontium isotope to separate co-mingled bones," he said. "This should tell us who's who of the three men."

Finnegan said in the future, he hopes to work on Missing In Action recovery searches in Laos and Cambodia.

"Currently, I am working on MIA cases from Korea and World War II," he said.

Michael Timberlake, head of the department of sociology, anthropology and social work, said Finnegan is a well-known consultant in the field of anthropology.

"He is an accomplished scholar and a great teacher," he said.

Rosalys Riager, member of the political science department advisory council, said she learned many new things from Finnegan.

"This futuristic view of identification is an amazing thing, especially as we move into the 21st century," she said.

Business dean set to leave; destination is Ohio

KIMBERLY HEFLING
Collegian

Daniel Short, dean of the College of Business Administration, is resigning and will leave K-State July 1 for the Miami University in Oxford, Ohio.

At that time, Short will become dean of the Richard T. Farmer School of Business. He has worked at K-State for three years.

"Their university has many of the same values and traditions that K-State has and a similar emphasis on undergraduate education," Short said. "They also have a surprising level of resources supported by the state and private donations."

Short said when some people leave a place they look at what's bad, but he has nothing but the utmost respect for K-State.

"There was nothing but support from the faculty, students, alumni and central administration," he said.

Short said the state of Ohio has a long-standing commitment to higher education and contributes to the University.

"It's a larger program with a larger number of faculty and greater resources and more opportunity for creative program development," he said.

In comparison, Short said Miami has 3,000 in the college and K-State has 2,000, but Miami has a $13-million budget and K-State has a $4 million budget. In addition, Miami has a faculty of 135, and K-State has 45 faculty in the college.

Short

Before leaving, Short said he plans to work to finish plans for the Calvin Hall renovation.

"It's a big project, and I want to be sure it's completed," he said. "We need to put together plans and finalize resources so it becomes a reality."

Ironically, Short said the renovation process will begin July 1 — the same day he will be leaving K-State.

"I guess before all the dust and dirt I get to leave," he said.

Renelle Everett, junior in accounting, said she is disappointed to see Short leave.

"The college of business is really going to miss him," Everett said. "He is a really influential person in our college with the renovation and various other projects."

Everett said as a member of business ambassadors she had the opportunity to work with Short to create a recruitment video for the college of business.

"He was the supportive and influential person and willing to do anything to make sure we succeeded in the video recruiting project," she said. "We would not have done as good a job without his help."

Everett said part of the reason the video was made was because Short never gave up on the idea.

"He was positive no matter what," she said.

"He made us feel good about what we did and was responsible for a lot of the drive behind the project," Everett said.

Artists' works require no explanation

WILLARD ART

Brian Bays' and Monique Sevenans' show runs through Friday in the Willard Art Gallery. The gallery's hours are from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m.

WILLARD ART GALLERY

How many times have you been to an art exhibit, looked at a painting and asked what it was?

Most of the time the artist has some 10,000-word explanation for their work that makes sense to about two people.

And sometimes that lengthy statement is a bunch of hogwash that has either been better illustrated or more intelligently discussed before.

All of that is about to change.

You'll find no out-of-this-world explanation with any of the work of artists Brian Bays or Monique Sevenans now showing in the Willard Art Gallery.

The duo's bachelor of fine arts show is in Willard through April 7. The gallery's hours are 8 a.m. to 5 p.m.

Bays' work is influenced by human anatomy, offering eerie explorations of lungs and other organs in prints and ceramics.

"I've always been interested in anatomy," Bays said, dressed in a vintage tuxedo for the show's opening.

Bays took the class Structure and Function of the Human Body at K-State, where students work with human cadavers.

Bays' experience with the human body is readily evident in his works, which can best be described as "cheesy and drippy," according to Bays.

His aquatint "Mayocardia" is a very organic, drippy work that faintly reveals images of miniature skulls in it. Not that the skulls are intentionally there, but there are drips that can be deciphered as skulls.

Bays' work has a very dark mood, which can be attributed to Bays' "feeling of grossness" he says he experiences when thinking of biological forms.

"I don't want it to be beautiful and shiny, but organic and gooey," he said.

Monique Sevenans' work, which is quite a bit lighter than Bays', is unconcerned with representing anything but what you want to see.

In a short introduction, Sevenans states "there are no preconceived notions or complicated concepts behind what I have done."

Sevenans' oil painting, "Doorway," is a textured piece of earthy, organic colors divided by strong lines.

If you stare at the piece, you're likely to see a fumbling group of people making their way through a doorway. Of course, you may see something entirely different.

All of Sevenans' work, including many teapots, ceramics and paintings, was done in the last eight months, having been inspired by cracks in the sidewalk.

Sevenans only asks that you "open your mind and react to the simpleness" of her work.

With Sevenans' and Bays' savvy work, what you see is what you get, and in these times, that is refreshing.

McCAIN SHOW

Bradley A. Finson's show runs through April 22 in McCain Auditorium. McCain's hours are from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m.

MCCAIN AUDITORIUM

With spring slowly seeping into existence, vibrant color is suddenly noticeable in trees, flowers and hillsides.

It's also quite noticeable in Bradley A. Finson's master of fine arts show in McCain Auditorium, which runs until April 22. McCain is open from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m.

Finson's color-filled paintings follow in line with Bays' and Sevenans' work in that it is non-representational. Finson goes so far as to state outright "what you see is what you get." A very welcomed dose of honesty, indeed.

Finson's show is a working timeline, showing his earlier work done in square or rectangular format framed like a conventional painting to his newer work done with wood, duralar and acrylic.

His "Days of Yore," acrylic on masonite, creates a marvelous depth with the use of warm and cool colors.

"Promethean Rhapsody," acrylic on masonite, is another excellent painting that sweeps your eyes along its deep swirl of red. Arguably the most interesting pieces in the show are his sculptural pieces.

"Nightwing" and "Leprous Little Lepidopteran," both acrylic, duralar and wood, are skeletal fragments partly transparent and partly color-coated. Whether they represent skeletons or just splashes of color, they are not to be missed.

UNION SHOW

Lisa Houha-Bailey's and H.L. Anderson's exhibits will run in the Union Art Gallery through Friday. The gallery's hours are from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m.

UNION ART GALLERY

Feminist art on this campus has waned for too long, resorting to shock value or, more recently, commercial rip-off.

That is why Lisa Houha-Bailey's master of fine arts show in the K-State Union Art Gallery is so important. It is art for the intelligent woman — or man.

Unlike the previous two shows, Houha-Bailey expects you to understand her work. Lucky for us, she's very successful in conveying her message. It doesn't give us nudes for sex's sake but reacts to art history and cultural tradition by giving us the voluptuous nude woman and asking us not to touch.

Houha-Bailey said in her introduction she is interested in the way history has revealed women to be ultimately powerful and utterly powerless. She depicts her woman as potentially dangerous yet lush and smiling.

If Women's History Month passed you by or disinterested you intellectually, drop in and see Houha-Bailey's intelligent work.

Also in the Union Art Gallery but separated entirely from Houha-Bailey's work is H.L. Anderson's master of fine arts show, featuring many of his metal sculpture pieces. They are very natural, constructed of rusted metal, rocks, wood and some clear glass.

Both shows close Friday. Gallery hours are 8 a.m. to 5 p.m.

McCain Auditorium
Kansas State University
General Public $18 Senior Citizen $16 Student $9

Join the lively, bawdy pilgrims on the local vicarage lawn for the finals of the annual Geoffrey Chaucer Storytelling Competition. Tales are told of love, lust and laughter. Some are traditional and visual; others are, in the funniest and most good humored way, a little less delicate. The New Vic's raunchy and rambunctious rendering is not perhaps one for purists, but is definitely one that would have Chaucer rolling in the aisles.

"Are they like Monty Python? Kind of, but not as cerebral. Are they more Benny Hill? No, their work is intellectually conceived but equallly crazed. . . .They are simply the best theatrical comedy group in the world today." (Bill Royston, The Philadelphia Inquirer)

This program is not suitable for children.

For tickets call 532-6428 or come to the McCain box office. Box office hours: noon to 5 p.m. weekdays; from 1 p.m. before weekend matinees; and from 5 p.m. before weekend evenings. Tickets are also available at the usual outlets.

Persons with disabilities call 532-6428. Kansas State Bank, in cooperation with the Manhattan Arts Council, provides free bus service to series events for patrons 55 years or older. For details, call Marie Dellen at 587-4000, 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. weekdays.

Presented in part by the Kansas Arts Commission, a state agency, and the National Endowment for the Arts, a federal agency. All events in the McCain Performance Series are supported by the K-State Fine Arts fee.

SPRING FOOTBALL '95

A guide to spring football drills for K-State and the other Big Eight teams

SPRING FOOTBALL PREVIEW

JEREMY CRABTREE
Collegian

The Big Eight Conference will give it one last go-around.

This season will be the league's last before it officially becomes the Big Twelve Conference in 1996.

But before the football games begin to be played in the fall, spring practices will be conducted to help teams prepare.

■ Nebraska continues to be probably the league's top team, returning both running back Lawrence Phillips and Orange Bowl MVP Tommie Frazier.

After suffering from blood clots in his leg, which sidelined him prior to the Huskers' fifth game, Frazier returned to lead them to the national title.

"You're always trying to get better," Frazier said. "I feel like I can improve all facets of my game."

If Frazier goes down, the Huskers can turn to Brook Berringer. He proved that he was more than capable while filling in for Frazier last year.

■ The Colorado Buffaloes lost the most of any Big Eight team from last season, but they still look to finish strong.

Last season, the Buffs were led by coach Bill McCartney, Heisman Trophy winner Rashaan Salaam and all-Big Eight selection Kordell Stewart.

However, they are all gone.

But former assistant Rick Neuheisel is leading the Buffs.

"Any time that you lose the senior class that we lost, you have a reloading job to do," Neuheisel said. "But that's what's neat about college football — that the young players now have a chance to make their mark."

■ The Sooners are also under a new leader. The Oklahoma program is now being led by Howard Schnellenberger.

Despite the change at the top, the Sooners have a bundle of players returning from last season.

"We should have a pretty good idea who will be number one, number two and in some cases even number three on the depth chart."

■ Kansas has several players vying for spots in the backfield.

This includes at the quarterback position, where Mark Williams and Ben Rutz are fighting for the top spot.

"On offense, we lost a starting quarterback. However, we think we've been able to steadily increase the talent at that position," KU coach Glen Mason said.

The running-back position looks solid as June Henley, Mark Sanders and Eric Vann all return.

■ The Missouri Tigers will be under the guidance of second-year coach Larry Smith, who promises to restore the Missouri football program to a respected program.

"We know what we want to do," Smith said. "Now it's just a matter of us getting better at it — getting players to do what we want them to do and do it consistently all the time.

"That was probably the biggest problem from last year."

Last season was a rebuilding one for the Tigers, but this season Smith said he expects to see some progress.

To achieve success, the Tigers will have to replace quarterback Jeff Handy, who rewrote Missouri passing records.

That responsibility will fall into the hands of Brandon Corso.

After blocking a punt for a touchdown in a victory against Oklahoma last fall, several Wildcats celebrate in the end zone. Spring practices began for the 1995 season last week. They will conclude with an inter-squad scrimmage on April 22, which will be conducted in KSU Stadium.

Are the Cats ready to reach top of Big Eight?

JEREMY CRABTREE
Collegian

Despite returning 15 starters from last season's Aloha Bowl squad, K-State has several big holes to fill before next season starts.

Those holes are at the quarterback position and at the running-back slot.

That's because the Cats lose all-Big Eight quarterback Chad May and K-State's all-time leading rusher, J.J. Smith.

"It's tough to improve," K-State coach Bill Snyder said. "The running-back position is not that big of a concern. We have a talented group of young guys.

"It's going to be hard to replace Chad. We've got some big shoes to fill."

May threw for 2,571 yards last season, and he will be replaced by either Matt Miller or Cody Lee Smith.

Miller was May's understudy after transferring from Texas A&M, and Smith was a highly regarded junior-college player.

However, Smith is back in California after suffering from a stomach virus, which will keep him out of spring drills.

"He has a virus of some sort," Snyder said. "He would vomit no matter if he had eaten or not. He is hospitalized back in Southern California. He's with his family physician undergoing tests."

So that leaves Miller as the No. 1 signal caller in spring drills.

"The focus on Matt will be a little different direction," Snyder said. "He's more mobile and elusive. He's more of a play-action passing type of quarterback."

The running-back slot will be filled by sophomores Eric Hickson and Mike Lawrence, who both saw a lot of action on special teams last season.

Both backs have the speed to excel in the Cats' quick-draw running attack, but they lack experience.

"They are some gifted young guys, but they have little playing experience," Snyder said. "They both have a lot of similarities. All are elusive and quick with the football in their hands.

"They will all have to become experienced quickly."

The offensive line is another area of concern for the Cats. Gone are tackles Jim Hmielewski and Barrett Brooks, but center Jason Jones is returning to anchor the O-line.

Also returning with experience from last season's offensive line are Ross Greenwood, Chris Oltmanns and Kendyl Jacox.

The Cats' defense was the Big Eight's third-rated defense and ranked No. 23 nationally last season. Eight players are returning from that defense.

K-State's defense was also ranked seventh nationally in pass efficiency defense and fifth in scoring defense.

Snyder said it would be difficult to say if the team would be better than last year but said, "Yes, we can be improved over last year."

The strength of the defense is the defensive line.

Back is third-team all-American Tim Colston, after he recorded 91 tackles and eight sacks last season.

Also returning are defensive ends Nyle Wiren and Dirk Ochs. Both have earned Big Eight weekly honors.

The Cats' defensive backfield is also loaded with talent. After losing starters from last year, a group of unheard-of underclassmen stepped up to make the K-State secondary the best in the league.

Back at the corners are last season's all-Big Eight Freshman of the Year Chris Canty and first-team all-Big Eight selection Joe Gordon.

The safety positions seem to be stacked.

Mario Smith and Chuck Marlowe both will return. Marlowe was a first-team all-Big Eight selection last season.

The linebacking position is the biggest hole the Cats have to fill on defense because the Cats lost Laird Veatch, Kirby Hocutt and Mike Ekeler to graduation.

However, second-team all-Big Eight selections Percell Gaskins and DeShawn Fogle are returning.

Fogle sat out the end of last season because of a knee injury. Travis Ochs, Dirk's brother, is also expected to make a big contribution after being red-shirted last season.

No matter who the Cats' quarterback is this season, he will have plenty of experienced receivers to throw to.

All-Big Eight receiver Tyson Schwieger, Kevin Lockett and Mitch Running return to form one of the country's best receiving corps.

The Cats also have an experienced tight end, Brian Lojkato, to look to this fall.

Snyder said his goals for the spring are to improve fundamentals.

"The enthusiasm is good," Snyder said.

"We will also try to identify two deep at each position."

Good weather gave some athletes a chance to compete for the first time at the KSU Open Saturday at R.V. Christian Track.

About half of the team did not compete in the meet, using the time to rest and train instead, Coach Cliff Rovelto said.

"I think we got a lot out of it for those who competed," assistant coach Jill Lancaster said. "The weather was great, and there was some good marks."

Lancaster said the road trip to Texas during spring break had some athletes tired. K-State competed at the College Station Relays at Texas A&M March 17 and the Southwest Texas Dual March 24.

"After the two meets in Texas, we have some people who needed a break," Lancaster said. "We have a tough string of meets ahead with the Texas Relays, the Kansas Relays and the Drake Relays."

Kirsten Schultz captured two first-place finishes in the shot put and the javelin with marks of 42 feet 2-3/4 inches and 156'6".

Kristen Schultz finished second to her sister in the shot put with a heave of 40'1/4" and third in the javelin with a toss 150'5".

Travis Livingston won his second-straight race Saturday in the 110-meter hurdles with a time of 14.21 seconds. Livingston set his personal best at the Southwest Texas Invitational.

"This is the first time we've had Travis full-time," Lancaster said. "He got a lot of work in this fall, and it's starting to pay off."

Livingston was a member of the K-State football team in 1993.

The athletes who didn't make the trip to Texas were getting their first taste of competition this season, Lancaster said.

"I think a lot of the teams approached this meet the same way we did," Lancaster said. "All of them had some athletes who hadn't competed yet and some who were a little tired from the indoor season."

Aaron Larsen competed for the first time since having elbow surgery. Larson finished second in the javelin with a throw of 217'4".

Larsen finished second to former Wildcat Dennis Nelson, who was competing unattached.

K-State travels to Austin, Texas, for the Texas Relays Friday and Saturday.

Cyclones, Pokes look to rebound

Running-back position is solid as Brock Olivo returns after a solid freshman season.

"Our goals for the spring are pretty simple. No. 1 on offense, run the football," Smith said.

■ Bob Simmons, former Colorado assistant, is the new coach for the Oklahoma State Cowboys.

However, it won't be a total rebuilding process for the Pokes, as they return most of their offense from last season.

This includes quarterback Toné Jones and tailbacks David Thompson and Andre Richardson.

The Pokes' offensive line only loses one starter from last season, along with a strong but small nucleus of returning defensive players.

■ Iowa State will be starting over from the basics this spring.

"We're starting from scratch," new Cyclone coach Dan McCarney said. "We will install our system and find the best 22 men to start. The most productive men will prevail. "We will stress fundamentals and refine technique."

Look for the Cyclones to install a pro-style offense, featuring both one-and two-back formations.

Top returners for the Clones are running back Calvin Branch and linebacker Tim Sanders.

"We've got to eliminate the big play," McCarney said.

"In time, we will build a solid, strong defense. We'll give people different looks this spring."

Karen Nicholson returns a shot during the Cats' home match against Oklahoma Tuesday.

Cats drop 2 home matches

BRIAN THOMAS
Collegian

It's been a rough week of action for the K-State tennis team.

After an impressive 9-0 win against the Missouri Tigers in the Big Eight Conference opener, the Wildcats struggled at home as they dropped a pair of conference matches to Oklahoma State and Oklahoma.

With the losses, the Cats fell to 7-8 overall and 1-2 in conference play.

Sunday saw the No. 43-ranked Oklahoma State Cowgirls come to Manhattan.

OSU had no problems with an easy 8-1 victory over the Cats.

K-State racked up only one victory during the day.

Wildcat all-American Karina Kuregian roughed up OSU's Kelly Press 6-1, 6-2.

"It was a poorly played tennis match," tennis coach Steve Bietau said.

"There wasn't a good level of emotion or intensity from anybody."

The Cats were hoping a Monday visit from the Sooners of Oklahoma would produce some better play.

K-State could not pull out the victory as OU slipped past the Wildcats 6-3.

The Cats claimed two singles victories over the Sooners.

Kuregian blew out Anne Covert 6-0, 6-1 in No. 1 singles, improving her record to 23-5 on the season.

"Karina is playing well," Bietau said.

"She is playing with a lot of confidence. She is really attacking on the court. She's had an impressive string of matches dating back to spring break."

Also in singles, Dinah Watson captured a hard-fought 6-1, 4-6, 6-0 victory against Monique Malan.

Kuregian and Shrubsole started a new doubles winning streak later in the day.

MARK LEFFINGWELL/Collegian

Heath Schesser rockets the ball to first base to complete a double play in the third inning of Tuesday night's game.

Cats outlast Sooners

JEREMY CRABTREE
Collegian

K-State used a five-run explosion in the bottom of the seventh inning to cruise to a 7-1 victory over the defending national champion Oklahoma Sooners.

"We showed a lot of character tonight," K-State coach Mike Clark said. "This was a good college baseball game. Finally, the good guys won tonight."

The Cats' outburst was sparked when Scott Poepard doubled down the right-field line to plate two runners.

K-State didn't stop there. When Adam Green stepped to the plate with the bases loaded, he used that to his advantage as he laced a triple down the right-field line.

A K-State victory seemed in question up until the seventh, as the Sooners had a slim 1-0 lead.

However, behind the right arm of Matt Koeman, the Cats remained close until they could score some runs.

In fact, Koeman silenced the OU bats, giving up only two hits and 11 strike-outs.

"It was the best game that I've ever pitched," Koeman said. "I've been thinking about this game for four days now."

Clark said Koeman was impressive.

"Their only hits weren't very hard," Clark said. "He pitched impressively against a good-hitting ball club."

Iowa State snaps K-State's win streak

NICOLE POELL
Collegian

The streak is over.

After winning four games in a row, K-State dropped two out of three games to Iowa State during the weekend.

After winning four consecutive games in last week's home action, the K-State baseball team was looking to continue that trend through the weekend against the Iowa State Cyclones.

It didn't happen. The Wildcats lost Saturday's opening game, 6-5, despite out-hitting the Cyclones and committing no errors.

Iowa State jumped ahead early with two first-inning runs and then added three more in the third.

But K-State didn't give up. The fourth inning saw Cat catcher Chris Bouchard get on base with a walk and then advance on a double from Dave Hendrix.

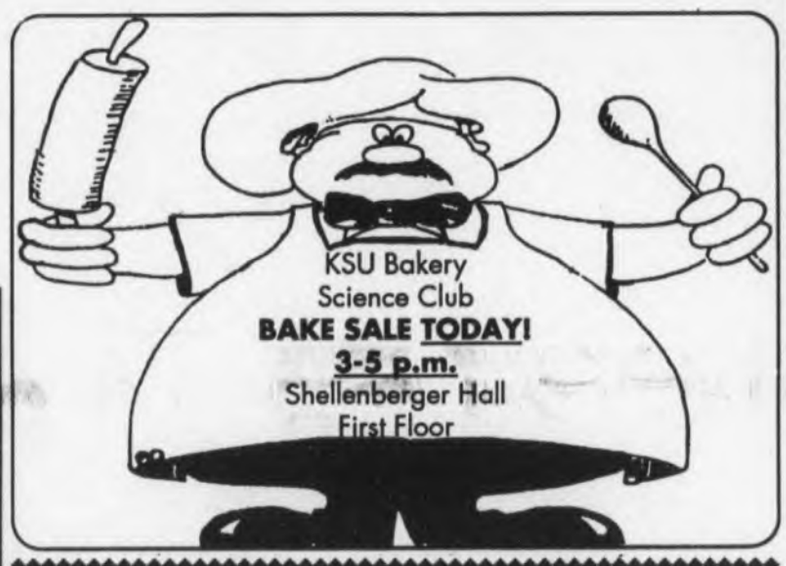
K-State kept threatening the Cyclones, adding one run in the sixth on a walk to Scott Poepard and a two-out single from Adam Green.

Chris Hess gave K-State a single in the seventh, which got another run across the plate.

The Cats' Tim Decker contributed some ninth-inning dramatics with a lead-off solo home run, putting K-State within one.

But that was all the Cats would get as they lost for the first time in more than a week.

Saturday's nightcap didn't look good for K-State at the start as the Cats fell behind 8-3 in the early innings.



But sparked by Poepard's grand-slam home run in the seventh inning, K-State rallied for seven runs to pull ahead of the Clones, 10-8.

Iowa State wasn't through yet, as they tied the game at 10-10 to force extra innings.

K-State still had enough offensive power left over as Heath Schesser delivered a one-out, two-run single, and Decker tripled to ensure the Cats' victory.

Getting the win for K-State was Larry Walty, who went 6-2/3 innings while allowing just two hits and two runs.

Hopes of taking two from the Clones were dashed Sunday as Iowa State beat the Cats.

Father falls for student his son's age

Dear Cassie,

While helping my 18-year-old son move into his residence hall last fall, I met a girl who lives on his floor.

A few weeks later, she called me at work and asked if I was free for lunch. Since then, we've seen each other once a week and talk on the phone at least three to four times a week. My son went on a spring break trip, and we had our own little vacation.

Cassie, how do I tell my son that his 39-year-old father is in love with a woman his age?

Signed, A Confused K-State Alumnus

Dear Confused,

You and your son need to have a serious sit-down together. Alone. Now. For your sake, his and hers, you'd better hope this isn't a casual fling. Remember, you still have to face her parents.

3 local bands help kick off Tombs' race

MIKE BUNCH
Collegian

Bosom is back in town.

That's right — the local band is back to perform in Manhattan tonight at Snookie's Bar.

The group is appearing at Snookie's in Aggieville with two other local bands, Coolerspoon and Whipping Brady, as part of a benefit concert for student body presidential candidate Andrew Tomb.

"This is the big fundraiser for the campaign," Tomb said. "We are selling our shirts at cost. We are just trying to recover expenses, so this will be the big event for us."

This will be the first time Bosom has played in Manhattan since last fall. The group has been working on its second recording, "Jerry-Built," with Reality Studios in Shawnee, Kan.

Bosom agreed to donate their time and headline the concert, along with Whipping Brady, a new act to Manhattan, who will open the concert at 9 p.m. and be followed by Coolerspoon, an act that is becoming popular in the area. A $2 cover charge at the door and $1 drink specials will be part of the evening.

"I have been good friends with Bosom for quite a while, and they said if I ever ran for president, they would help out," Tomb said. "Coolerspoon and Whipping Brady were suggested to me by friends, and all of the groups agreed to do it."

Tomb said he expects the concert to be a success and one of the best he has seen in the area.

"You can't go just anywhere and see three great bands for $2," he said. "Besides, there will be dollar drink specials too."

Bosom will be debuting new material off the album as well as music that made them popular in the area.

"This will be kind of a listening party for them as well as a benefit concert," Tomb said.

The four-man group sounds better than ever on the new release. They have evolved and can carry a more complete sound this time around.

The group wrote 10 of the 11 tracks on the compact disc themselves, a trademark of a group ready for success.

Not stuck in the traditional college-band mold, the music on the CD ranges in style from a hard-driving rhythm to a more mellow, ballad sound, but it is all worth listening to.

Bosom also throws in harmonica, banjo, lap steel and keyboards to mix up the instrumental quality and add to the depth of the music.

Bill to reduce car taxes would end school property-tax levy

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Senate negotiators, wary of a House-passed bill that would eliminate the state's 35-mill property-tax levy for schools, presented a car-tax reduction proposal Tuesday.

The bill would cut far less than plans passed by either chamber.

The offer was made during a conference committee meeting with House negotiators over how much tax relief the Legislature should provide motor-vehicle owners.

The new proposal would reduce the property-tax assessment rate on cars, vans and pickups from the present 30 percent to 28.5 percent next year.

It also would reduce the state mill levy on cars to 31.35 mills.

The plan, however, does not go beyond one year.

Sen. Audrey Langworthy, R-Prairie Village, chairwoman of the Senate Assessment and Taxation Committee, said the plan was developed because the House passed a bill that would remove the property tax as a source of revenue for public schools.

That bill, scheduled for debate in the Senate on Thursday, would shift the funding for schools to income and sales taxes.

Its passage would be a big and unexpected change in Kansas tax policy. Langworthy said the Senate offer is a way of sending a message to the House about its passage of that bill.

"It's intended to show them the reality of the situation," Langworthy said.

Rep. Phill Kline, R-Shawnee, chairman of the House Taxation Committee, said the new proposal does not provide enough motor-vehicle tax relief.

"I don't know where that puts us," Kline said, who has been a strong advocate for motor-vehicle tax relief throughout the session.

"I'm willing to focus on car taxes," he said, adding that lawmakers are trying to understand the full implications of the school-tax bill.

Langworthy said some House members voted for the school-levy bill on Friday and now are asking the Senate to save us from ourselves.

"The message back is this is serious business," Langworthy said.

This latest plan unveiled Tuesday to cut car taxes is a sharp departure from any that has been discussed at the Legislature.

The Senate, more cautious in its approach, passed a bill that would reduce the tax-assessment rate from 30 percent to 15 percent over 10 years.

Critics of that measure say it would not provide enough tax relief.

The House, where members are eager to cut taxes, passed a measure that would reduce the assessment rate to 15 percent over five years and would eliminate the statewide mill levy for cars.

Critics of that measure say local units of government would have to increases property taxes on homes and businesses.

Filipino culture dance-oriented

Song, self beauty showcase important parts of culture

LUKE WEHRMAN
Collegian

Philippine dancers performed dances of their native culture for International Week Tuesday afternoon in the K-State Union Courtyard.

Dionisia Trigo-Stockli, research associate in grain science and Philippine dancer, said music and dance is a very important part of the Philippine culture.

She said dancing for the Filipino people is a natural form of expression and is a form of relief from daily living.

At the event, the group performed dances set to native music.

The first dance was the "Pandanggo Sa Ilaw," or candlelight dance. It is a popular fiesta dance.

The dancers moved about while balancing a candles on their heads and holding a candle in each hand.

"It's a very popular dance with a Malaysian influence," Trigo-Stockli said.

"It's kind of difficult because you have to make sure the candles stay on your head."

Trigo-Stockli said Filipinos are known for their love and affection. This is brought out in the "Carinosa" dance.

"It's a dance of affection depicting lovers' caring and affection," she said.

The final dance, called the "Tinikling," seemed to be the crowd favorite. "It's our native dance," Trigo-Stockli said. "It mimics a bird and how birds hop to escape the bamboo traps set in the rice stalks."

Members of the Philippine group moved bamboo shoots around the floor of the courtyard as dancers hopped in and out of them, mimicking the birds.

Maria Odejar, graduate student in economics and statistics and Philippine dancer, has been performing native Philippine dances since high school.

"My favorite dance is the 'Tinikling.'" Odejar said.

"It is a big part of our culture."

After giving the crowd a sample of the "Tinikling," the dancers invited audience members to give it a try.

"I think it's beautiful," Gloria Jaramillo, Manhattan resident and crowd participant, said.

Paul Gleue, senior in anthropology, jumped at the chance to try the "Tinikling" dance.

"It was fun," he said.

"I'm interested in foreign cultures."

Gleue said International Week is a good chance for students to get a picture of other cultures and compare it to their own.

"It's always interesting to watch and learn from other cultures," Gleue said.

Trigo-Stockli said the Philippine culture is very diverse.

"We have a lot of influences from the Spaniards, from the Chinese and from the Malaysian culture," she said.

Trigo-Stockli said it is good that students are experiencing other cultures through International Week.

"K-State has many international students. It helps students know and understand each other's culture," she said.

▶ STATE LEGISLATURE

State funds lessened by $30 million tax break for building, industries

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Giving the state construction and manufacturing industries a $30-million tax break during the 1995 legislative session took a bite Tuesday out of projected revenue for the fiscal year that begins July 1.

The Consensus Estimating Group lowered its projection for income the state can expect to receive during fiscal year 1996 by $33 million from what it had forecast last November.

The new figure, $3.376 billion, establishes the amount of money the Legislature has to spend from the general fund on the fiscal '96 budget.

The $30-million loss of revenue caused by the repeal of the 2.5-percent sales taxes on labor used in new construction and energy used in manufacturing accounted for all but $3 million of the reduction.

Otherwise, the estimators said the economy would pretty much maintain the course it is on, perhaps becoming slightly softer in 1996.

There is nothing dramatic in what the group projected for the final three months of fiscal year 1995 and for fiscal 1996, said Dan Hermes, financial economist in the state Budget Division and one of the estimators.

It means the Legislature will have $33 million less to spend on the fiscal 1996 budget than it would have had if the two taxes had not been repealed.

However, Gov. Bill Graves budgeted for the $30-million loss in revenue when he submitted his budget proposals to legislators in January.

The two sales taxes were enacted in 1992 to help pay for the state's takeover of the financing of public education.

The two taxes, which Graves plans to sign into law Wednesday during a ceremony at the Goodyear tire plant here, were roundly criticized by Kansas business as detrimental to economic development.

Graves proposed their elimination during his 1994 election campaign.

The Consensus Estimating Group, made up of fiscal experts from the Budget Division, Revenue Department and Legislative Research Department and university economists, had forecast five months ago that the state would take in $3.409 billion in tax, interest and agency earnings during fiscal year 1996.

Tuesday, they lowered that projection to $3.376 billion, a 1-percent reduction. The estimators also reduced the expected revenue coming in during the present fiscal year by $7.3 million, from $3.288 billion to $3.281 billion.

Most of that reduction came in cutting the expected revenue from the oil- and gas-severance taxes by $7 million.

Natural gas prices and production have plummeted the past year, and $6.1 million of the drop is attributed to gas.

On the plus side, the group raised the anticipated revenue coming from the compensating use tax, which is a sales tax Kansas collects on items its citizens purchase in other states.

Hermes said the $6-million increase in use taxes was attributable to more mail-order firms agreeing to collect the state sales tax on things Kansans buy from them, and an increase in automobile purchases by Kansans in Kansas City and Joplin, Mo.

On the debit side, the group reduced individual and corporation income taxes by a combined $12 million for 1996.

TIPS FOR WRITING A CLASSIFIED AD

Always put what item or service you are advertising first. This helps potential buyers find what they are looking for.

Don't use abbreviations. Many buyers are confused by abbreviations.

Consider including the price. This tells buyers if they are looking at something in their price range.

CATEGORIES

To help you find what you are looking for, the classified ads have been arranged by category and sub-category. All categories are marked by one of the large images, and sub-categories are preceded by a number designation.

WE DO NOT USE PHONE NUMBERS OR LAST NAMES IN PERSONALS.

Pro-life advocates support adoptions

Members of Students for the Right to Life said they are against abortion in all cases, even in cases of rape or incest. Talkington said an abortion after rape or incest is a second violation of a woman.

"Abortion is wrong in all cases," she said.

Talkington said the group promotes adoption as the most loving alternative to abortion.

The organization has become its strongest in the last five years. There are about 150 on the group's mailing list.

Male members of the group said abortion is not just a women's issue.

"Everyone says its a woman's choice. To me, it's a choice of life or death. The person who is ultimately affected is the baby," Brian Suellentrop, junior in finance, said.

Students in the group said they promote love and life, not violence.

"Abortion is an issue of life. Our group is about the compassion and love we have for the unborn babies that we don't even know," Suellentrop said.

Some members of the audience said they were offended by the group's presence.

"The way they handed out the papers was wrong. They asked me if I would like some information on Sarah Weddington, and I said yes. I didn't know it would be pro-life information and a diagram of how abortions are performed," Rachel Williams, freshman in psychology, said.

Another member of the audience said she felt the group was pushy and more anti-abortion than pro-life.

"I thought it was very annoying. I think they're a very 'anti' group," Laurie Lovitch, sophomore in Spanish, said.

One group member said negative reactions are expected at protests.

"It's annoying to some people who have already formed an opinion. There are two sides to the issue, and I think it's important that we're here," Heather Lies, freshman in business, said.

"If I could save one child's life by being here, then the protest is worth it to me," Lies said.

Lies said she feels people can be extreme with their feelings, but she said she had never seen violence at a protest. She said she has seen many protests at clinics, several in which her family or friends participated.

"I have a cousin that has been arrested three times for protesting for pro-life," Lies said.

One sign carried by a protester compared abortion to slavery and pointed out that the Supreme Court's Dred Scott decision, which stated slaves were property, was overturned.

"It's good to compare slavery and abortion because it shows that the Supreme Court was wrong. The Supreme Court has made mistakes," Lies said.

Aliases common on 'Purple Affair'

he's not sure.

"What listeners?" he said.

Aaron Decker, co-host of "A Purple Affair," said he took the call seriously.

"I had a hunch, but in the back of my head I was thinking that it could have been someone who really was beat up," Decker said. "On the air you can't say, 'Oh yeah, whatever,' but I had a feeling that it could be a joke."

Decker said using an alias on the air is not unusual.

"People do it all the time," he said. "Many callers are skeptical about using their real name."

Decker said he has some reservations about people talking about something as serious as being attacked while using an alias.

Decker said he is unsure if listeners believed "Fred."

"I haven't gotten feedback," he said. "There could've been someone who took it seriously, but there also could have been someone who didn't take it seriously."

Decker said he is sure most listeners would have come to the conclusion that if "Fred" had really been attacked, then he would have called the police.

Homeowner loses historic house because of K-177 bridge construction early city development.

Because no building permits were issued before 1930 or 1940, tax records were used to estimate the time the house was built.

According to the tax records, the house was built sometime in 1868, but the report was unsure if the present structure is the same as the one that was built in 1868.

Umscheid said he did not understand how the state could come in and take his house away and give it to the historical society.

"They are going to just bulldoze it in," he said.

The house was habitable up to the time the state took possession.

"One of my mechanics and his family lived in the house," Umscheid said.

The house is not only livable, but it withstood the flood of 1951, he said.

"The house stood in 13 feet of water for seven to eight days in 1951," Bud Umscheid said.

Bud said they jacked his mother's piano up on 55-gallon drums in hopes of saving it.

"We found pieces in the backyard for days after," Bud said.

Clayton Umscheid said the family was shoveling out mud for days after the water went down.

"The flood waters reached the step just below the top step on the stairs," Umscheid said.

Umscheid said the state is giving anyone the option to relocate the house, but they have to bring it up to livable standards.

"The state will give anyone up to $5,000 toward relocation. That is the cost of the demolition," Umscheid said.

Upkeep on the house has not been kept up since the state took over ownership.

"It has been vandalized since it is just sitting down there by itself," he said.

Umscheid is no longer fighting to keep the house.

"I would have rather moved it," he said, "This is my retirement. I don't have a retirement fund, just investments in real estate."

KDOT, under the laws of eminent domain, deposited $51,000 into an escrow account and considered the sale final.

"They gave me $25,000 for the land and $26,000 for the house," Umscheid said. "I still owed $32,000 on the mortgage from the time I bought it from my brothers."

The kicker for Umscheid was the fact the land is zoned C-5, which is a commercial zone.

"This is the best commercial land with the widest range of options," Umscheid.

Umscheid said the mill owner, who was under C-5 zoning also, was given $8.18 per square feet, while he was only given $1.71 per square feet.

"They offered me $2.23 per square feet, and I told them it was closer, but it wasn't there yet," he said.

Umscheid said it was as if KDOT did not care what he wanted.

3 main components are key to crucial Roe v. Wade give up a right they have had for so long easily, but many people take the decision for granted because they are accustomed to the right.

"I feel strongly this position is right. People feel strongly that it should be their choice, not the government's," she said.

Weddington compared a quote from Indira Gandhi, "I have felt like a bird born in too small a cage," to the plight of some American women.

"I tried to push doors open wider for women to have more opportunities," Weddington said.

She said there were three main components of the Roe v. Wade case.

Weddington said the first consideration is whether there is right to privacy under the U. S. Constitution.

"The court said there is a right to privacy," she said.

Although the right might be implied, she said she thought denying women abortions is depriving women of liberty.

Secondly, the court faced the question of the fundamentals of pregnancy, she said.

"Nothing affects a woman more than the number and spacing of her children," Weddington said.

Finally, the decision was affected by a compelling reason to regulate a woman's choice for abortion.

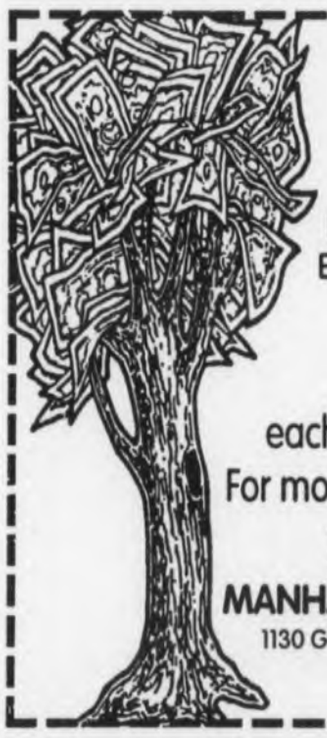
Weddington said the census does not count a pregnant woman as two people, nor does the government issue two passports to pregnant women.

People may not understand the need to be pro-choice if they have not read the horror stories in magazines of the 1970s, said Vandetta Mallory-Belyea, non-traditional student in pre-business.

"Pro-choice needs to be available for women who choose," Mallory-Belyea said.

Weddington said abortion will continue to be legal, but access will be more difficult.

Locations and funding for abortions will be harder to find, Weddington said.



"Only 16 percent of counties in the United States have abortion facilities," she said.

Following Roe v. Wade, Weddington was an assistant to President Jimmy Carter from 1978 to 1981.

Weddington said she left the Carter administration with a quest to defend the Roe v. Wade decision and support women in leadership positions.

"Women had always been leaders, but seldom in high leadership positions," she said.

Support crucial following loss

KIMBERLY WISHART
Collegian

Five K-State students have committed suicide this year, and five groups of families and friends are grieving their losses.

K-State has a dean's position that specifically deals with student crises.

"I work with parents, boyfriends, spouses and friends to help them after the crisis," Carla Jones, dean of student life, said. "I also work with prevention and intervention."

Jones has been with K-State for nine months now.

She said she has talked to classes and parents at orientation, and has visited greek houses, faculty members and every dean on campus to let them know the services were available.

"I also notify the college of the boyfriend and girlfriend if they are having problems, and I can arrange long or short-term counseling," Jones said. "Students who were close can go to the funeral with me too."

Students often need extra help after dealing with a suicide because they feel they are responsible or they didn't do enough, Sherry Benton, psychologist at University Counseling Services, said.

"You can do everything you can to help, but sometimes they decide that suicide is the only way out," Benton said. "If that happens, they need to get to a protected environment."

Benton said tender, loving care was a way to help someone thinking about suicide pull out of it. Support is also an important factor for those who were affected.

"Support is crucial," Benton said. "Talk to people around you, those who shared the same grief. Just talking about it can help, but sometimes counseling is necessary."

In any counseling session, Benton said, you may see people who are thinking about committing suicide.

"Everyone thinks of suicide at one point in time. They may immediately dismiss the thought and laugh it off, but everyone considers it, if even only for a split second," Benton said. "It's when they're at the peak of what they can tolerate."

Benton said the first step is to ask if

Election forum tonight

AMY SIMON
Collegian

The candidates for student body president and vice president will meet in a forum at 8:30 tonight in Derby 134.

All five pairs of candidates plan to participate in the forum moderated by Lin Bliss, president of the Kansas State University Association of Residence Halls.

The candidates will answer questions about campus issues, including parking, student finance and campus safety.

"We planned this forum to better inform our residents of the platforms of the student body president candidates who will represent them," Bliss said.

While the forum is organized in hopes of informing residence hall students, everyone is invited.

"It is open to anyone who is interested in the forum," Bliss said.

Bliss said he hopes to see 30 to 40 people in attendance.

Jeremy Blair, presidential candidate, sees the forum as a chance for students to objectively choose between the candidates.

"It will be the first time that students will have a chance to judge the candidates without a programmed response," Blair said.

Jeff Peterson, incumbent presidential candidate, said he hopes students take advantage of the opportunity to hear the candidates voice their opinions on the issues.

"It is a great opportunity for students," Peterson said. "This debate is an important event, and the election is an important decision."

Liz Ring, presidential candidate, said she also hopes many students attend.

"I think is is great that the leadership of the residence halls have organized this debate," Ring said.

Brain aneurysm claims athletic employee's life

LISA ELLIOTT
Collegian

The assistant athletic director and manager of campus services died Wednesday while being transported to the University of Kansas Medical Center in Kansas City, Mo.

Mark Bonjour, 41, died of a brain aneurysm.

Bonjour collapsed in his home at 317 Dix Drive between 1 and 2 a.m. Wednesday. He was taken to the Saint Mary Hospital and transferred to Stormont-Vail Hospital in Topeka.

He was being flown to the medical center when he died.

Among Bonjour's most notable accomplishments with the athletic department were his work with the architects on the indoor practice facility and the new press box.

Athletic Director Max Urich expressed sympathy to the family.

"The athletic department, Kansas State University and the Manhattan community are deeply saddened by this tragic loss. Our hearts go out to Judy and Mark's entire family," he said.

Urich said Bonjour was a valuable employee at K-State for a long time.

"In his own quiet way, he touched the lives of many people in this community," he said. "He left his mark in a number of ways through his work with the facilities and our athletes."

K-State baseball coach Mike Clark said he was saddened by Bonjour's death.

Bonjour

"I don't know anyone who didn't like him," Clark said in his press conference following Wednesday's win over Oklahoma.

Bonjour began working at K-State in 1979, when he was named director of Ahearn Field House sports and recreation facilities. He was named assistant director of general services in 1983, named director of facilities in August 1988 and was promoted to assistant athletic director in the summer of 1990.

Bonjour's job included monitoring all the on-campus facilities used by the athletic department and coordinating all the construction and renovation projects. He also coordinated all the press-box activities for the sky suite holders.

Bonjour received his bachelor's degree in corrections with a minor in business administration from Washburn University in 1975 and was working on a graduate degree in public administration.

Bonjour is survived by his wife, Judy, and two daughters, Allison and Ashley.

Photographer's pictures tell of AIDS strifes

CARY CONOVER
Collegian

A Manhattan High School graduate gave an audience a taste of what life is like outside America Wednesday afternoon.

The featured speaker for Women's History Month, Sue Hostetler, freelance photographer, told tales of her experiences photographing in countries all over the world.

"You really learn to be flexible," she said about her traveling.

Her speech was originally scheduled for March 28, but an assignment came up requiring her to travel to Russia for 10 days.

Freelancing as a contributing member through Impact Visuals, a social-documentary photo agency in New York, she has traveled to Russia, Rwanda and Cuba. She now lives in Chicago.

In 1992 and '93 Hostetler received a grant from the city of Chicago to photograph a series on women with AIDS titled "Invisible Women."

Through her black-and-white photographs, she said she wanted to show that AIDS wasn't an automatic death sentence. Most of the women had children, and they, too, were part of many of the photographs.

During a trip to Russia, she photographed a hospital in which a 7- or 8-year-old boy's hand was injured in an explosive accident.

Hostetler said she felt guilty because she didn't know the language enough to even ask the boy and his mother if there was anything she could do or to tell them she was sorry.

Hostetler said in situations like those, it was hard to do her job without feeling like and intruder with a camera.

"You know you are abusing power because you're not in their situation. There's a huge amount of power that goes along with photography. The person behind the camera is always the one with the power. The subject is always rendered helpless," she said.

WOMEN'S HISTORY MONTH

As a social-documentary photographer, Hostetler said it's important to do the job right.

"Social-documentary photographers and photojournalists have to walk a fine line between letting your subject tell his or her story and helping the subject tell his or her story," she said.

Hostetler showed some slides from her trips. About half were color slides and half were slides from black-and-white prints. Hostetler said she liked black and white more than color for aesthetic reasons.

Judy Davis, director of the Women's Center, said she, too, was a big fan of black-and-white photography.

"I take great selfish pleasure in it. I love black and white, especially in the hands of someone like that," she said.

Davis had Hostetler's stepmother in a class last semester. That, coupled with an article she read in the Manhattan Mercury about Hostetler's work, convinced Davis that Hostetler would be a good person to have speak for Women's History Month.

Hostetler, who has been working on her own for four years, said she admired the work of such photographers as Dorothea Lange, Mary Ellen Mark and Richard Avedon.

Complaints lodged against K-State's Rowing Association

STEPHANIE STEENBOCK
Collegian

A group of former advisers, rowers and others interested in the future of the Kansas State Rowing Association made a complaint against KSRA stating that there is a fundamental problem with the governance of the organization.

The KSRA Grievance Committee heard the complaint on March 13 and made a recommendation to the University Activities Board.

Jim Hamilton, past adviser for KSRA, said he thought it would be better for both the student athletes and the University to shut the program down rather than allowing it to continue under its present governance.

Alex Binkowski, past coach and current vice president of KSRA, said he agreed there are philosophical differences within and outside the organization.

Hamilton said he believes the disagreement is not just a philosophical one.

"I believe certain people have an agenda to remove the buffer between the student athletes and the coaches," Hamilton said.

The complainants said they believe KSRA is a student sports club that should be governed by the students.

Bart Ransone, sophomore in history and pre-law, said he believes the biggest problem for the KSRA is that it has a vice president and a head coach who want to abolish a student organization.

"We are a student-run organization, and the students should have full authority," Ransone said.

Abigail Conrad, past adviser of KSRA, said she believes a few people in KSRA want to abolish the executive committee and make one board in which the coach would be the head.

"My question is, is a student club still a student club if the students aren't in control of the organization?" Conrad said.

Coach Al Koch said he believes it is hard for the complainants to accept that they cannot guide the crew and it is time to let go.

"I don't believe that the allegation has anything to do with what is really the problem," Koch said.

He said he never wanted to abolish the student-advisory board. He said he wanted to

▶ CHILDREN LABORING IN PAKISTAN TO MAKE PRODUCTS FOR UNICEF

NEW YORK (AP) — Children as young as 6 years old toil in Pakistan making surgical instruments for UNICEF and soccer balls for U.S. markets for only a few dollars a day, CBS reports.

As many as 25,000 children labor in workshops in Sialkot in the Punjab region of Pakistan, says the report to be aired on Thursday's "Eye to Eye with Connie Chung."

The network said that children as young as 10 work nine hours daily, six days a week filing and sanding surgical instruments for UNICEF.

UNICEF said it does spot checks of the factories in Pakistan from which it buys surgical instruments and has found no evidence of child labor.

"We are absolutely committed to eradicating child labor around the world," said UNICEF spokeswoman Emily Booker.

The CBS crew visited workshops in Sialkot unannounced and filmed children making soccer balls for Adidas America and Reebok International Ltd.

Reebok and Adidas told the Associated Press that they learned of the practice from CBS and were working to halt it.

Pakistan has long been chastised by international rights groups for child labor problems. Children as young as 4 are chained to looms to make carpets and work in other industries.

The government of Prime Minister Benazir Bhutto, who arrives in the United States Thursday for a visit, has said that bonded labor of children — or the trading of children's services for a loan — is a problem.

Pakistan barred the practice in 1992, but as the government works to develop its economy, the law remains largely unenforced.

Human-rights groups have revealed child labor in other South Asian countries, including India, Bangladesh and Nepal.

▶ CLINTON PROMISES NO USE OF WEAPONS

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Clinton pledged Wednesday not to launch nuclear attacks against countries that have no nuclear weapons and agree not to acquire them.

Similar assurances will be offered by the leaders of Russia, Britain and France, Secretary of State Warren Christopher said in a statement drafted for presentation to foreign diplomats at the State Department.

He also said China would provide similar assurances as part of a United Nations resolution.

Christopher, in his prepared statement, said the presidential declaration would be released later.

▶ INVOLVEMENT DENIED IN OVERSEAS DEATHS

WASHINGTON (AP) — As the widows of two men killed in Guatemala listened intently, acting CIA Director William O. Studeman denied complicity by the agency in the deaths. But key Senate Intelligence Committee members accused the CIA of misleading Congress.

Studeman also denied reports that the CIA increased funding for its clandestine programs in Guatemala to make up for President Bush's cutoff of military assistance at the end of 1990.

President Clinton said at a news conference Wednesday there were still open questions on whether CIA actions in Guatemala were appropriate.

▶ OUSTER CONCERNS STAFF IN O.J. TRIAL

LOS ANGELES (AP) — The O.J. Simpson jury lost a sixth member Wednesday, intensifying fears a complete panel won't survive the stresses of the trial long enough to deliver a verdict.

"It's a concern that we have, that we'll be able to keep a pool all the way through," said Jo-Ellan Dimitrius, a jury consultant for the defense.

The ouster of the 38-year-old black woman, reportedly for failing to disclose her experience with domestic abuse, left only six alternate jurors. If the alternative pool is exhausted and the number of jurors falls below 12, a mistrial would be declared unless both sides agreed to continue.

▶ UCLA FANS LOSE CONTROL IN CELEBRATING; 20 ARRESTED; 2 INJURED

LOS ANGELES (AP) — Police used rubber bullets and batons to restore order after a raucous celebration by thousands of UCLA basketball fans turned into a bottle-throwing melee. About 20 people were arrested and two were injured.

Officers fired 20 rounds of rubber and bean-bag bullets to disperse what they said were a relatively small number of the 4,000 revelers who turned violent after the Bruins clinched their first NCAA basketball championship in 20 years Monday night.

"People were just throwing bottles into crowds, and one guy turned around and got it right in the face and without a doubt lost all of his teeth," said Cmdr. Tim McBride. The other injury was to a police officer who suffered broken ribs, authorities said.

The day after the melee in tiny Westwood Village, adjacent to the UCLA campus, the basketball team arrived at Los Angeles International Airport to a jubilant but peaceful welcome by about 500 fans.

"Everything's basically a blur right now," said Ed O'Bannon, who scored 30 points and grabbed 17 rebounds in the 89-78 victory over Arkansas in Monday's title game in Seattle.

After a brief celebration, the players received a police escort to UCLA, where they were greeted by about 200 students.

They were to appear on the "Tonight Show" with Jay Leno later in the evening.

Campaigning turns digital

MIKE BUNCH
Collegian

The move to the Internet has reached politics.

For the first time, candidates for student body president and vice president are using the World Wide Web to publicize a campaign.

"I have been on the Internet a long time, and it is a big part of my life," Andrew Tomb, student body presidential candidate, said. "I wanted to reflect that through this web page."

Tomb said it is a good way to package information in its complete form.

"All media act as a filter on information. This is a way to get it to people directly," Tomb said. "Just because it is out there doesn't mean people have to read it, but it is there for them to see."

Tomb and his brother Mark, a sophomore in economics, had to get permission from the Unix administrator in order to set up the page.

"The Unix administrators said they wouldn't give anyone special privileges, so they created the student-government file," Tomb said. "This way all candidates could have access to do the same thing."

Once they had permission to set up the page, it was time to construct it.

"It took about six to seven hours of building and neatening up the page," Jeff Dougan, sophomore in mechanical engineering, said.

"It took a little time here and a little time there to get it done. Now we just try to update is as often as we can," Dougan said.

Other candidates can set up their own pages in the student-government folder to advertise campaigns.

WEB SITE

The Tomb Campaign Web Page is at http://www.ksu.edu:80/stugov/tombwww

Andrew Tomb can be e-mailed at tombiv@ksu.ksu.edu, and Mark Tomb can be e-mailed at tomberm@ksu.ksu.edu

"I would encourage them to do it, but I don't know if any of them will," Tomb said.

"I was on the web before and knew that many students had the accounts and surf the web. I thought this would be an easy way to reach them," he said.

Web pages are constructed in a simple language called Hyper Text Mark-up Language. Tomb said it is easy to learn.

"Anyone who can type can do this," he said. "It isn't difficult, and it's an interesting way to dress up information."

Dougan said the page is a complete source of information about the campaign.

"We have the complete platform set up, divided into five categories, so anyone who wants to see Tomb's position can read it," he said. "We also have a biography of Mark and Andy, SGA policies and a question-and-answer forum."

Tomb said one of the goals of the page was to get feedback about issues and respond to it.

Anyone who accesses the page can send a question to either Andrew or Mark using the built-in form on the home page or by directly e-mailing them.

All the questions, with the e-mail address of the people who sent them, are posted with responses on a special page linked from the home page.

Tomb said he thought the web was the way of the future because it can be updated and changed constantly.

"I think the web is making traditional print media obsolete," he said.

"I think the democratic possibilities of the web are infinite. You can do whatever you want, however you want," Tomb said.

▶ NATIVE AMERICANS

Stereotypes can be erased by awareness

ANNE HAZLETT
Collegian

Native Americans are not Indians.

"There is this stereotype that we all ride and wear feathers. I've only been on a horse a couple of times in my life," Casey Camp Horinek said in a speech Wednesday at the K-State Union.

Horinek, a prominent Native American rights activist and actress, recently starred as Turtle Woman in the movie "Lakota Woman." She has also acted in several other movies, including "Son of the Morning Star" and "Geronimo."

As an actress, Horinek said she is a voice for her elders and ancestors in the Ponca tribe.

"The image of Native Americans as drunk, lazy warriors has to be corrected," she said. "We've got to raise people's level of consciousness."

Horinek said all students, regardless of race, should be concerned about the civil rights of Native American people.

"Everyone should be concerned, because what has happened to one man can just as easily happen to the next man," she said.

Horinek said students can work to change the modern Native American stereotype by carefully choosing their words and their actions.

"Don't just ask for change, demand it," she said. "You have a right not to go see that stupid movie that portrays our people as wild Indians, to say when your kids start school you want them to learn about the history of all people or not to listen to a song titled 'Indian Outlaw.'"

Students can also raise the level of public awareness by paying attention to the messages they support in the products they buy, Horinek said.

"We need to think about what it means to drive a Jeep Cherokee, to support a football team named the 'Redskins,' to ride in an RV called a Winnebago," she said. "These things are not disgusting people like they should be every single day."

Annette White, sophomore in anthropology and president of the Native American Student Body, said Horinek does more than speak out for the civil rights of Native Americans.

"Casey is more than your average superwoman," she said. "She listens to the cries of her people and then takes the word activist literally."

Yearbook receives award for excellence

SARA SMITH
Collegian

The 1994 Royal Purple received its fifth consecutive Columbia Scholastic Press Association Gold Crown award March 16.

Only three collegiate yearbooks received the award this year.

Ron Johnson, director of Student Publications Inc., said the 1994 Gold Crown was just one in a long line of honors for the Royal Purple.

"I think this just shows us that the RP is unparalleled," Johnson said.

Johnson said he thought the Gold Crown and the Pacemaker award, which is given by the Associated Collegiate Press/College Media Advisers, are awards that reflect the Royal Purple's commitment to excellence.

The Royal Purple has received both the Gold Crown and Pacemaker awards every year since 1990.

Renee Martin, assistant editor of the 1995 Royal Purple, said she thought the awards were important, but they were not the goal of the staff.

"The awards aren't as important as selling the book, because if students don't buy it, it will be in danger of dying out," said Martin, a senior in journalism and mass communications and secondary education.

Martin said she thought the Royal Purple has been dedicated to excellence.

"I think we work really hard to keep the book high-quality," Martin said.

"I think you need that pickiness to remain high-quality," she said.

IN OUR OPINION

by the Collegian Editorial Board

Students need chance to learn about candidates

It means campaign workers should not be flooding the phone lines and possibly shutting out students with questions.

K-State students are getting the short end of the stick — again.

Students need opportunities to talk, question and form opinions about the candidates in this year's elections. This year's elections have already started an atmosphere that is not voter-friendly.

Candidates are being asked questions by their own campaign workers during interviews.

A poorly located, timed and publicized debate left candidates talking to a small number of students.

Students aren't taking advantage of the Collegian's offer of collecting questions for the candidates.

Student elections might not make everyone's list of favorite things, but the students running for office are supposed to represent the student body, not the 20 percent of the student body that manages to vote. Students should inform themselves of the candidates and issues. Students should also have plenty of chances to inform themselves.

It means students need to get motivated and take some initiative to get informed. It means campaign workers should not be flooding the phone lines and possibly shutting out students with questions. It means if you have to shove a debate into Union Forum Hall at 10:30 a.m. with very little advertising, reschedule it.

BUSTER'S LAST LAUGH

Pro-choice should mean giving the unborn the right to choose life

JOHN HART

Sarah Weddington, the attorney who argued the winning side in the landmark Roe v. Wade case, spoke in McCain auditorium Tuesday night about abortion and the women's rights movement.

It seems twisted that the abortion issue is construed as a victory for women when the cost has been millions of unborn lives, approximately half of whom are female.

Of course, pro-choice advocates don't see it that way. To them, the overriding concern in the debate is a woman's right to choose, and questions about whether abortion is murder and determining the status of the fetus are often side-stepped.

If pro-choice advocates want others to take their views seriously, these are precisely the questions they need to answer.

To simply conclude a woman should have the right to choose without answering these questions makes for a very bad argument.

For example, in the case of Susan Smith, the North Carolina woman who drowned her two little boys, you don't find the National Organization for Women defending Smith's right to choose to kill her children. Why?

Because her act was murder, which we understand to be the deliberate unjust killing of a person, and her boys' right to life overrides her right to choose to kill them.

If abortion can be shown to be murder, then it becomes inane to argue for a woman's right to choose to murder.

The pro-life argument follows the same logical pattern. They believe abortion is murder and the unborn person's right to life overrides the mother's right to choose to kill her child.

Pro-choice supporters need to convince their opponents otherwise by persuading them that abortion is not murder.

This, too, is the reason I am pro-choice. I'm for the right of unborn persons to choose to live or die, and since we can't ask them, I'll give them the benefit of the doubt and choose life.

This is typically attempted by arguing that the fetus is not a person, and killing it is not murder.

At this point, the logic of the pro-choice position begins to break down, especially if they are trying to defend the legality of post-viability abortions.

The only meaningful difference between a viable fetus and a young child is the fact that a fetus is inside the mother's womb.

Pro-choice supporters sometimes claim that such a fetus is a non-person. This is like arguing that an apple on a tree is a nonapple but suddenly becomes an apple once it's picked and removed from the tree.

The issue becomes more complicated when discussing pre-viability abortions.

However, in these circumstances, one thing is clear: human life begins at conception.

Weddington attempted to justify her pro-choice position by claiming that the liberty referred to in the 14th Amendment gives women the freedom to choose to have an abortion. This, too, is the reason I am pro-choice. I'm for the right of unborn persons to choose to live or die, and since we can't ask them, I'll give them the benefit of the doubt and choose life.

Abortion is the most talked-about issue in America that isn't talked about. Everyone has their opinion on the issue, but few people are prepared to defend their position.

Too often the question in the abortion debate is not "is abortion right or wrong?" but "what's best for me?"

When abortion is the choice, this self-centered approach denies a human being the chance for a life and is often pursued as a quick fix to avoid the consequences of irresponsible behavior.

As the presidential primaries heat up, many candidates will claim abortion is wrong but the government should stay out of it.

This is a politically expedient position, but it avoids the real questions of the debate.

Again, if abortion is murder, just as Susan Smith's act of drowning her children was murder, how could we possibly defend the legal right to choose abortion?

As more and more candidates and citizens adopt this wishy-washy position, pro-life supporters should now more than ever stand firm and never back down from defending the most fundamental right of all — the right to life.

John Hart is a senior in political science.

Strike ruined the game

Dear editor,

Baseball has ended for another year. Yet another season has been ruined by the supposed players, and they expect us to return in droves to partake in their greed.

I, for one, will never return to the game of baseball as long as greedy players block the playing of the game, as long as greedy players file injunctions that block any real settlement, and as long as the probability exists that the greedy players can strike again.

For a few brief weeks, I believed that the true meaning of baseball would be born again in America. That players who really cared about the game would begin to play at the big-league level again.

I even bought tickets for opening day and began watching the new players in action during spring training. I watched a Royals team that led the AL in team ERA at 2.72, that had a team batting average of .292, and that hustled on every play. In fact, on Saturday (the last game of the season), the Royals beat the Atlanta Braves 5-2 behind the strong pitching performance of Paskievitch and the clutch hitting of Edgar Caceras.

Such players should have been appreciated while they played, because we will never again see such effort from the babied millionaires who claim to represent the game.

Crank calls are no joke

Dear editor,

Recently, a story ran about a hoax played on our K-State radio station. I don't think people realize how big of a problem this is. When something like what the hoax implied really happens, it needs quick attention. The hoax hurts that — it's like crying wolf. It puts a doubt in your mind: "So, is he/she really hurt, or is this a hoax?"

"When something like this really happens, it needs quick attention."

CHRIS REEVES

The difference, although maybe a couple of seconds, is crucial. Three to five minutes meant the difference between my ability to write this letter and my parents visiting me at a plot.

This should, however, not have any bearing on the election. I truly believe that the Tomb brothers are good people, and they would not engage in such a damaging activity. To the lone prankster; however, I have something to say. From all of us hospitalized, hurt, beaten, raped, robbed or anything else in the past year: please ask us one by one before you decide to conduct a supposed "good deed" so you can realize the damage you create. I hope you feel better now.

Re-electing incumbents will assure continued success at K-State

JEFF PETERSON

BRAD FINKELDEI

Editor's note: This is the fourth of a five-column series written by the student body presidential and vice presidential candidates. It is meant to give the candidates an opportunity to share their concerns and platforms in-depth. The columns will run daily in the order that the candidates will appear on the ballots.

What is more important, affecting the lives of thousands of current and future K-State students and the direction the state of Kansas moves in funding higher education, or giving someone else the chance to be student body president?

That is the question we ask you to keep in mind when considering the choices for your next student body president and vice president.

We have chosen to run for president and vice president because it matters.

It matters that students have a voice.

It matters that students have influence.

It matters that students make a difference.

In the last year we have demonstrated, and in the next year we will demonstrate that students do make a difference, and most importantly, that students do matter.

We are six months ahead of our opponents in our ability to accomplish change for students. Here are some of the areas we feel are important to all students.

To enhance the quality of campus life, we propose to make certain student fees optional.

For instance, if some students have their own health-insurance plans and do not want to use the services provided by Lafene Health Center, they should not have to pay for those services. Taking a look at all of our student fees is necessary to accomplish real change for our students.

We take great pride in the fact that for the first time in 10 years, student fees have decreased.

Presently, any student who lives 30 miles outside Manhattan has the option not to pay certain student fees. We believe this is an opportunity that should be made available to all students.

This would shift our current structure to a user-fee system. By doing so, we will enable our services to compete and be the best that students can receive anywhere.

In short, we want to see that students get what they pay for.

All of us are concerned about the bottom line, student fees and tuition. A year ago, we pledged to work to maintain financial access to an education for K-State students. During last year's campaign, we addressed that concern by promising that we would not support any student-fee increases.

We take great pride in the fact that for the first time in 10 years, student fees have decreased. That means when we go to pay our tuition and fees next fall, the fee portion of our bill will have decreased for the first time in a decade.

STUDENT ELECTIONS '95

We will strive to see that this trend continues in the upcoming year.

To address the dramatic rise in tuition, we initiated a grassroots effort called Access the Future. As a part of that effort, we wrote letters to you and your families, encouraging you to share your concerns about the increasing cost of tuition with your state legislators.

In addition, we have visited with legislators in Topeka and coordinated community visitations across Kansas to stress the importance of keeping education financially accessible to students.

Together, our efforts have and will continue to make a positive difference.

We have shown a commitment to student safety. Most of the violent attacks against students take place on the perimeter streets surrounding campus.

To address that reality, we took successful action by writing a proposal to expand the campus safety patrol a block off campus. To further ensure student safety, we will work with the Kansas State University Association of Residence Halls to submit a proposal for annexation funds to extend the safety patrol several blocks beyond the campus perimeter.

We are proud of the leadership role we have taken on this issue and are excited to see that several of the other campaigns are now making campus safety a priority.

We believe that optional student fees, cost concerns and campus safety are important student issues. However, the next student body president and vice president will make decisions about parking, the K-State Union and a thousand other issues we won't be able to discuss during the campaign.

Consequently, we ask that before voting, you meet and get to know all of the candidates. Then vote for a president and vice president that you can relate to and that you trust.

We believe we have had a successful year working for students and hope that you think we have represented you well.

If you want your student government to reach its potential this next year, then we are your candidates.

If you want to give someone else a chance, that's why we have an election, so you can decide.

We are asking for your trust and support on April 11 and 12 — because it matters.

Brad Finkeldei, student body vice president

Little holes that cause so much

PAIN

Story by Cori Cornelison Art by Daryl Blasi

A bad mix of alcohol, stress, aspirin, Mountain Dew and a family history of ulcers forced Dave Hughbanks to change his life drastically.

Hughbanks, freshman in electrical engineering, got so sick from an ulcer he was forced to drop out of school this semester, move home to cope with his pain, take numerous medications and follow a strict diet.

He said dropping out of school was the hardest adjustment he had to make.

"I was trying to think of anything I could do to keep in school, but the dean said the best thing to do was to drop out," Hughbanks said.

He said the dean helped make the adjustment easier by notifying all of his instructors and refunding his full tuition for the semester.

Unlike most ulcer sufferers, Hughbanks said he didn't experience common recurring stomach pain.

"I went to Lafene thinking I had an ear infection and the flu," he said. "I had no idea it was an ulcer."

Hughbanks said he walked into Lafene Health Center pale-faced and feeling dizzy, and immediately the doctors could tell there was something more seriously wrong with him than an ear infection.

He said he was rushed to the hospital for a blood transfusion after he was given a blood test that revealed a blood count of five. The normal blood count is 15.

Hughbanks said he was released from the hospital two days later and taken to his home in Omaha, Neb., with doctor's orders to rest, watch his diet, avoid alcohol and follow his prescription.

Two months later, Hughbanks said he is doing a lot better but will have to continue to watch his diet.

"I'll probably be on medication for the rest of my life and have to watch my diet," he said. "It's something I'll have to always look after."

Lorrie Hutchinson, senior in clothing and textiles, said she has been taking medication for her ulcer for three years and sometimes still experiences problems.

"I just went to the emergency room a month ago," she said. "I was having severe stomach pains, and I couldn't sleep or anything."

Hutchinson said she tries to watch her diet, avoid stress, eat early in the day and take antacids after meals to prevent her ulcer from recurring.

She said stress played a big part in the development of her ulcer.

"I was so stressed out from working two jobs and going to school that I had to quit one job," Hutchinson said. "I was trying to do too much."

Isaac West, freshman in political science and speech, said his doctor told him that a combination of stress, wrestling and histamines triggered his ulcer when he was 16 years old.

"When I was wrestling in high school, I didn't eat as much, and the doctor said he thought it might have played a role in the development of my ulcer," he said. "He also said the histamines triggered the acids in my stomach, which caused a mild allergic reaction."

West said he still has stomach pains associated with his ulcer and might have them for the rest of his life.

"They told me if I really adjust my living style, then it could possibly heal up," he said. "I don't think I could totally cut all of the bad things out of my diet."

Watching one's diet is a good idea to help cure an ulcer, Daniel Martin, staff physician at Lafene, said.

It is also important to take all medication prescribed by a doctor to help the healing process, he said.

Antacids and/or antibiotics are frequent treatments for an ulcer, and surgery is necessary occasionally, Martin said.

"Most of the time, ulcers aren't terribly serious but can cost your life in extreme cases," he said.

Common symptoms of an ulcer people should be aware of include a burning sensation in the pit of the stomach, around the edge of the ribs and around the belly button an hour or more after a meal, Martin said. Occasional vomiting and nausea are also involved in some cases.

Recently, a type of bacteria called helicobacter pylori has been found to cause at least 80 percent of ulcers and cases of gastritis, the beginning stage of an ulcer, he said.

Bacteria were never thought to have been a cause of an ulcer until recently, Martin said.

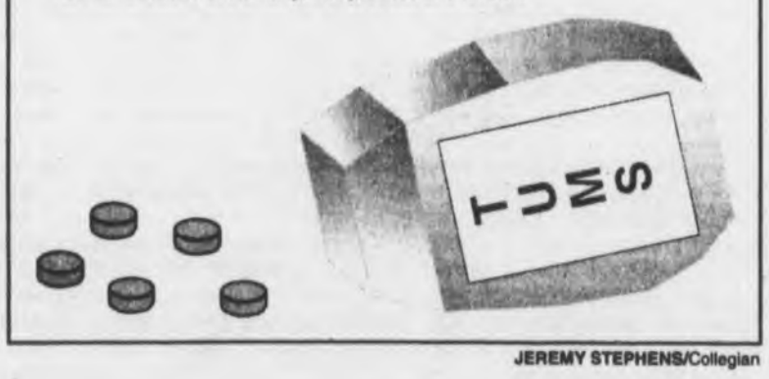
THE FAST FACTS ON ULCERS

4 Basic Contributing Factors

1. Heredity — Ulcers are not inherited, but people whose close relatives have ulcers are two to three times more likely to develop ulcers.
2. Drugs and Diet — Heavy, prolonged aspirin use, especially when combined with smoking, alcohol, steroids or severe protein/vitamin deficiencies, can contribute to ulcers.
3. Stress — Each person reacts differently to tension. But work, school, family problems, etc., can contribute to the development of ulcers.
4. Personality — According to some studies, highly anxious, self-critical people who keep feelings bottled up might have a higher risk of ulcers.

Common Symptoms



- Recurring stomach pain is the most common sign of ulcers. The pain is usually a dull, gnawing ache that lasts for several days or weeks — then disappears for weeks or even months.
- Pain usually comes and goes.
- Pain usually occurs two to three hours after a meal.
- Pain usually occurs in the middle of the night, when stomach is empty.
- Other symptoms can include back pain, bloating and burping, nausea and vomiting.
- Food usually relieves discomfort.

Severe Symptoms

- Sharp, sudden stomach pain.
- Tarry stools.
- Bloody or "coffee ground" vomiting.

Preventive Measures

- Follow physician's orders about diet, medication, smoking and living habits carefully.
- Avoid irritants such as aspirin, excessive use of alcohol, caffeine, chewing gum, cigarettes, etc.
- Maintain good health with a balanced diet and the right amounts of work, exercise and relaxation.
- Plan ahead to avoid hurry, worry, stress and tension.

K-State sweeps nationally ranked Oklahoma

K-State will play in a doubleheader against Doane College today. The first game will begin at 3 p.m. at Frank Myers Field.

PHILL SPIKER
Collegian

How sweet it is.

K-State completed a two-game sweep of the 10th-ranked defending national champion Oklahoma Sooners Wednesday afternoon with a 14-9 victory at Frank Myers Field.

K-State 14
Oklahoma 9

"I am very proud of them," said K-State baseball coach Mike Clark, whose team raised its record to 15-11 overall and 4-6 in the Big Eight.

"They came out and created offense. They just did a tremendous job."

K-State opened the bottom of the first with four runs. The Cats would never look back.

Clark said he wanted the Cats to keep their intensity from the first win against the Sooners.

"After the win yesterday, we wanted to keep the momentum going," Clark said. "We did a nice job in that four-run inning of creating things.

In the top of the third, Oklahoma would get as close to the Wildcats as it would for the whole game. Aric Thomas led the inning off with a home run to right center. Bobby Brown then tripled off the right center-field wall and would later score, giving the Cats a slim 4-3 lead.

The Cats would answer in the bottom of the inning with three runs of their own, making the score 7-3 after three innings of play.

"We never stopped creating offense throughout the whole ballgame, and with a ballclub as powerful as Oklahoma, it is imperative that we score," Clark said.

Although the Cats led the whole game, the Sooners made a late rally attempt in the top of the eighth.

After scoring four runs to make the score 11-9 K-State, Oklahoma's Rich Hills, who had already hit two home runs in the game, stepped up to the plate representing the winning run.

After taking the count to three and two, Hills hit a towering 409-foot shot into center field, which K-State centerfielder Tim Decker caught at the wall for the third out of the inning, preserving the Cats' two-run lead.

"It came off quick and kind of strong, but as soon as I saw it I knew I had a chance to get to it," Decker said.

The Cats would tack on three more runs in the bottom of the eighth to make the final score 14-9.

With the windy conditions in mind, Clark said pitcher Adam Novak couldn't have done a better overall job.

"He did a textbook job of what to do when the wind is blowing out at Frank Myers Field," Clark said.

"He got them to hit a lot of ground balls. He kept them off stride, and when they did get one up in the wind and out of the ballpark, they were only one or two run shots, not three or four run shots.

"Without the wind, they would have probably only scored one or two runs, and that's against one of the best teams in the country."

Even though Novak pitched more than seven strong innings, he said there were still things he could have improved.

"I made a couple of mistakes when I got the ball up, and I paid for it," Novak said.

Decker said the Cats had something to prove during this series.

"We wanted to come out and show that if we play the kind of baseball we are capable of, we can play with anyone in the country," he said.

Novak, who struck out six batters, got the win for the Cats, raising his record to 3-0.

Chris Hess paced the Cats' attack with four hits, including a home run and two RBIs. Brad Harker and Chris Bouchard added two RBIs each.

K-State's Chris Hess slides into second base during the Cats' 14-9 win over the Sooners Wednesday at Frank Myers Field.

K-State finishes 8th at Diet Pepsi Shocker Classic

"Out of eight rounds this spring, we've had one good round in each tournament."

MARK ELLIOTT
K-State golf coach

BERNIE HANEY
Collegian

The men's golf team put itself in a tough position to qualify for regionals after a disappointing eighth-place finish at the Diet Pepsi/Shocker Classic.

"We still have a chance, but we have to play real well the last two tournaments," K-State golf coach Mark Elliott said.

Shooting a team total of 311, the Cats struggled in the first round at the par-71 Tallgrass Country Club.

"We played terrible the first round. We were 27 shots out of first place after the first day," Elliott said.

K-State came back to shoot the third-best team score in the second round. Junior Scott Hovis fired a one under par 70 in the second round to tie for the best 18-hole performance of the tournament.

"He made five birdies and an eagle in that round," Elliott said.

The Wildcats couldn't make up any ground after shooting their worst score of 318.

"Out of eight rounds this spring, we've had one good round in each tournament," Elliott said. "They all need to play fairly well for us to do good."

Hovis was the team leader in scoring for the third straight tournament.

He shot a 225 total to finish in a tie for fifth place.

In the spring season, Hovis had fourth-, fifth- and sixth-place finishes in the three tournaments he competed in.

"We just need all of them to do it at the same time," Elliott said. "We can't do it with one guy playing good."

The next finisher on the team was junior walk-on Chad Myers, who finished with a bang on the last five holes and placed 29th overall.

Elliott said Myers was 11 over par on the first 13 holes but went four under par on the last five holes with two birdies and an eagle.

"He showed some guts not to let it get away from him mentally," Elliott said.

Elliott said the team needs to play well in Birmingham, Ala., next week and in the Big Eight tournament later this month to qualify for regionals.

He said K-State is probably in the eighth position as of now, and only the top seven make regionals.

The two teams the Wildcats can catch are Iowa State and Nebraska.

Elliott said he thinks the players have been making careless mistakes in the last two tournaments.

"Basically, they need to think better on the golf course," Elliott said. "They're hitting the ball fine."

The team is qualifying at the Custer Hill golf course this week and will leave Saturday for the Bent Brook/Blazer Invitational.

K-State hires 2 offense coaches

PHILL SPIKER
Collegian

K-State has hired two new offensive coaches.

Ron Hudson, who will oversee the passing game, and Greg Peterson, who will coach wide receivers, were announced as the two additions to the football staff Tuesday afternoon.

Hudson, who coached quarterbacks at Ohio State for six years, will be taking over for the recently departed Del Miller, who took the head coaching job at Southwest Missouri State.

K-State football coach Bill Snyder said Hudson's main responsibility will be the passing game.

"Ron will coordinate our passing game, and as always, Dana Dimel will coordinate our running game," Snyder said.

Snyder said he will oversee the passing game until Hudson learns the system.

"Ron is in a position to learn our system, and as Ron works into our system, I'll work out of it," Snyder said.

Before coaching at Ohio State, Hudson coached running backs at Illinois under current Los Angeles Raiders coach Mike White.

Hudson also had stints as quarterback and receiver coach with the USFL's Memphis Showboats.

He was the running-back coach under Terry Donahue at UCLA and also served as the quarterback coach and offensive coordinator under Gerry Faust at Notre Dame.

"Ron brings to our program an experienced knowledge of the game, great recruiting success and a background of exposure from some of the finest of offensive minds in the game," Snyder said.

"His dedication and work habits will fit right in with this staff."

Snyder said hiring Hudson, who recently took a job at Syracuse as the receiver coach, was definitely a positive for the football program.

"We were fortunate to hire him away from Syracuse," Snyder said.

Snyder wasn't the only person who said he was glad Hudson was hired.

"I'm very excited about working with him. He's got a lot of good credentials," K-State quarterback Matt Miller said.

Peterson, who was a two-time NAIA all-America wide receiver at Nebraska Wesleyan, assisted Del Miller with wide receivers as a graduate assistant in 1994.

Peterson also has experience as receiver coach at Nebraska Wesleyan, offensive coordinator at Eastern Oregon State, and a top assistant at Idaho, which is one of the top I-AA programs in the country.

"Greg has proven to be one of the up-and-coming young coaches in the profession," Snyder said.

"He has grasped our offense very quickly. He works well with and has the respect of our receivers, has excellent organizational skills and has already made an excellent contribution to our program."

Smith hospitalized with stomach ailment

DEREK SIMMONS
Collegian

Cody Lee Smith, a junior-college transfer many believed would replace Chad May as quarterback at K-State, has left the University because of illness.

Coach Bill Snyder announced Tuesday that Smith was hospitalized in Manhattan for a stomach virus but left for Southern California to consult with a family physician and the UCLA Medical Center.

"We are uncertain when he will get back. The condition is much better, but there is still some uncertainty," Snyder said.

"I doubt very seriously that we will have him, at least in competitive drills, during the course of the spring."

Snyder said Smith's illness began about a week or two into the spring semester but did not say when he left for California.

"The symptoms were vomiting. He was continually throwing up — with or without food in his stomach," he said. "When his condition didn't dramatically improve, he returned to Southern California."

The Wildcats, who finished 9-3 and third in the Big Eight Conference a year ago, are conducting their 15-day spring session, ending with a scrimmage at 3 p.m. April 22.

Snyder and the coaching staff are making efforts to keep Smith updated with the team.

"We send him videotape and literature of what we are doing," Snyder said.

In regards to whether the Smith's illness would carry over into the fall, Snyder said. "No one has indicated that it would, but they have indicated that it is possible."

MARK LEFFINGWELL/Collegian

Local singer/song writer Susan Drake, junior in philosophy, uses her music to express her thought and feelings.

Artist expresses self in song

Music writing has been primary since childhood

LUKE WEHRMAN
Collegian

Writing songs has always been a means of expression for Susan Drake, junior in philosophy.

Drake wrote her first song when she was 12-years-old. It was about being at her aunt and uncle's cabin in the woods of Oklahoma.

She has been playing the guitar and writing ever since.

She started playing the guitar with help from her brother and a class she took in the seventh grade.

Drake said people have a hard time expressing themselves, and music is one way to do that.

"I don't think people feel their feelings enough," Drake said. "The one way that they do is with music. It's like a socially acceptable way to be a gush."

Drake's style reflects her love for folk music.

Drake, who grew up in Dallas, attended the University of Texas for a couple years before spending some time in the service.

She then worked as a graphic artist in Tulsa before coming to school at K-State.

"Going back to school, I can tell I'm entering a new phase," Drake said.

Drake has been playing in bands since she was 21, but said she kind of got burned out playing with big bands.

Drake said her music has been influenced by many people .

"I've been influenced by about every song I've ever heard," Drake said.

She said Judy Collins and John Denver were big influences starting out, though.

"They were really big at that time – acoustic music was big at that point in time," Drake said.

Drake said music has always been a force in her life.

"Music has always been primary," Drake said. "I've always had secondary careers."

Drake said sometimes she writes a couple of songs a month, and other times she will go months without writing a song. It depends on what's going on in her life.

"I like for my songs to be intimate," Drake said. "When it's too strong to talk about, I like to write songs about it."

Drake likes to get the crowd involved.

During a performance at the Espresso Royale Caffe, Drake had the whole place singing along to "Blowing in the Wind."

At another point in the show, a man from the audience kicked in on the harmonica.

Blake Haoulihan, sophomore in accounting, said she enjoys Drake's music.

"I think she's good. I like the way she adds background to her songs by telling stories about why she wrote them."

When performing, Drake is usually accompanied by other guitarists. She said it gives a good feel in the background. It also allows her to play the flute.

"I like playing more with a partner because I can play the flute, and I really enjoy doing that," Drake said.

"It also lifts your music."

Many times while Drake is playing the flute, she and her partner will improvise. They just let the music flow.

Jack Hayes, sophomore in philosophy, has been accompanying Drake for a few months and says he has a good time playing with her.

PERFORMANCE

Susan Drake's next performance will be April 21. She will be playing in the free speech zone as part of The Earth Night Concert. The show is from 6:30 to 11 p.m.

"I enjoy working with her," Hayes said. "She has a fine voice, and she writes well."

Hayes said he fills in on the guitar wherever Drake needs him.

"I just like to accompany her with whatever sound she needs at the moment," Hayes said. "If she's happy, I'm happy."

Hayes has been playing the guitar for about 25 years, but playing in front of a crowd is something new for him.

"I've played mostly at church." he said.

"I just picked up enough tricks to accompany other people."

Hayes said accompanying other musicians helps his guitar-playing. It makes it more demanding.

"I like to play on this level," Hayes said. "It's good experience."

Universities threatened by pc, speaker says

CARRIE COX
Collegian

Today's universities are reflecting American society because of the way we look at quantity instead of quality.

The idea that universities today are a reflection of American society was presented Wednesday by Felix Moos, professor of anthropology and East Asian Studies at the University of Kansas.

"Too many universities today are seen as a manufacturing unit and are trying to measure the number of students they put out into the world. This is destroying academia and lowering the quality of education, which, up until now, has been the envy of the world," he said.

Paul A. S. Runyan, president of Students for A Valid Education, began the presentation with an overview of the general philosophies of SAVE.

"SAVE members are working toward an end to political harassment, academic freedom, free speech and inquiry, education not political indoctrination, and freedom from political correctness," Runyan, senior in political science, said.

Moos described the United States as an either-or society instead of a society that can assimilate a multiplicity of ideas. He used the example of Asian thinking, which he said is inclusive rather than exclusive.

"By Asian thinking, you can be a Buddhist, Christian and think as a Confucianist, all at the same time and be happy. But American society asks which religion you are: Protestant, Catholic or Jew," Moos said.

Moos said this either-or way of thinking has caused university administrators to be professionals instead of professors. He said this philosophy teaches students to learn a narrow field of scholarship instead of expanding knowledge.

Moos said universities are dominated by what he calls Ayatollahizations. He said his reasoning behind the term is an analogy of what Ayatollahs used to be.

"By definition, an Ayatollah is a Shiite religious leader, but we have come to associate the word's context with the dogmatic leaders of Iran," he said.

"Like those firm leaders, today's universities are dominated by different Ayatollahizations who constantly dismiss any different ideas which are not politically correct."

A German native, Moos came to the United States as a student in 1949. He said he prides himself of being able to look at America from the inside out but also from the outside in.

"It's important that we all be able to look at things not as what is one option vs. another, because this can drastically limit thinking. Sometimes you can't see the trees because you're standing in the middle of the forest," he said.

Panel discusses nuclear disarmament

Political changes provide economic challenges for world

JAMIE CONGROVE
Collegian

The United States and the rest of the world will have political, economic and environmental issues to discuss going into the next century.

A panel of three K-State professors talked about those global concerns Wednesday afternoon in the K-State Union Courtyard.

The panel members discussed political, economic and environmental issues for the next century.

The first panelist who spoke was Joseph Hajda, professor emeritus in political science, who discussed what he thought were the main concerns in the former Soviet Union and Eastern Europe.

"Citizens and leaders don't consider themselves to be in Eastern Europe, but instead Central Europe," he said.

"In Central European countries, they have had important political transformations. The economic challenge is strong, but it has been a successful transformation to a market economy." Hajda talked about how each of the 15 republics responded through the change and went through several crises.

"The end to fighting in Bosnia is very difficult to envision," he said.

The second panelist, Wayne Nafziger, professor of economics, said in the last 25 years the United States has not given enough money in aid to Asia and Africa.

"Africa and Asia need increased aid for food, environment, peace and water," he said. "Per capita, we give the least amount of money," he said.

The third and final panelist, Talat Rahman, professor of physics, talked about the nuclear non-proliferation treaty.

"The treaty says those who make nuclear weapons cannot export nuclear weapons to other countries or help other countries make them," she said.

Rahman said there is only one vague article in the treaty that recommends countries look into disarmament of nuclear weapons, but it is not mandatory.

"It only says to look into the idea. It does not require them, and that is where the flaw is," she said.

Rahman said she didn't agree with the treaty, and it wasn't conducive to all countries who participate in it.

She said she believes the countries who control nuclear power are the countries who hold the most global power.

"By signing the treaty, the power lies with those who have nuclear power, which means that those who don't have nuclear power will be taking a submissive role," Rahman said.

Rahman said she didn't think the treaty makes sense because it really doesn't do anything.

"The only thing it does is prohibit those who don't make nuclear power not to," she said.

One student said she was glad the University offered panels such as this one.

"It is important to have these because it is educative, and you get to know things that the news doesn't cover," Nyambe Harleston, junior in finance, said.

Addicted to O.J.

Viewers find case entertaining, ponder O.J.'s guilt

MICHELLE BELCHER
Collegian

Daytime soap-opera watchers are being snatched away one by one.

Since the O.J. Simpson trial began its nationally televised coverage, many K-State students spend hours every day glued to the TV set.

"I have watched it from the very first day. My mom called me with some comment about it, so I watched it," Rae-Ann Chadwick, sophomore undecided, said.

What would compel someone to sit through hours upon hours of testimony about a bloody glove and DNA testing?

Entertainment, curiosity and a million other reasons.

"I am just curious about what is going on," Terri Geis, junior in elementary education, said.

"I have learned a lot about how the judicial system doesn't work sometimes. It is all just going so slow."

Arica Graves, sophomore in elementary education, said she doesn't take any of it too seriously.

"I just watch it for the entertainment value of it all," Graves said.

Other students said they watch the Simpson trial for more serious reasons.

"I want to be informed so I am not misinformed by the media. Before I started watching the trial, I thought he was guilty. The media totally shows only one side, a biased view," Chadwick said.

Class time falls during most of the trials and tribulations of Simpson, but even that doesn't stop the most faithful followers.

"I watch it every day. If I have class, I just tape it," Chadwick said.

The big controversy surrounding the testimony of Simpson's houseguest Brian "Kato" Kaelin was a surprise to watchers.

"I feel bad for him. I can't imagine being put on the stand like that. He had questions over and over, and he had to get them exactly right each time. I can see where he could get confused," Graves said.

"I think he was trying to be as honest as he could," Chadwick said.

Students seem to be split on whether they think Simpson is innocent or guilty.

"It is tough to say, but I think the blood evidence proves he is guilty, but we will see what happens," Geis said.

"I think he is innocent, but who knows what will happen?" Graves said.

Just what will happen next seems to be the question of the hour. Surprises keep popping up in the trial.

"I think things are going fairly well for O.J., and they haven't even gotten to the defense side yet," Chadwick said.

Chadwick said during the Simpson trial right now, DNA experts are testifying.

"It's pretty boring right now and hard to understand, but I still watch it," Chadwick said.

K-State audience to watch Chaucer's medieval farce

STEPHANIE SWISHER
Collegian

A spinoff of Geoffrey Chaucer's "Canterbury Tales" will bring the rowdy and rambunctious antics of medieval England to McCain Auditorium Friday night.

London's New Vic Theatre will present its original interpretation of Chaucer's "Canterbury Tales" at 8 p.m.

The original 14th-century literary work by Chaucer tells the tale of a group of pilgrims who set out from London on a journey to the tomb of Thomas à Beckett, Michael Donnelly, associate professor of English, said.

"The story is about a group of people who are brought together for some circumstance, and they tell stories to keep entertained," he said.

Donnelly described Chaucer's work as one of the most famous frame-tale sequences of stories in English literature. Frame-tale sequences consist of stories that are constructed around a certain person using his or her personality and characteristics as a frame for the story.

"What Chaucer has done is taken a story and suited it to the character of the storyteller," Donnelly said.

"Some of the stories are very funny, and some are gripping tales of medieval life," Donnelly said. "It is an incredible work of art, but he didn't finish it. All we have is really a work of fragments."

The theater troupe performing the production has taken the original tale one step further and added a comedic twist, said Selena Shadle, director of operations for Robert Friedman Presents.

"The production is a spoof comedy of the original literary work based on the same story line," Shadle said.

Shadle said the "Canterbury Tales" is an English farcical comedy that places heavy emphasis on audience participation.

"The cast goes out into the audience and brings some individuals onstage to participate in certain scenes, and at the end of the production, the audience votes on the winner of the Canterbury story-telling competition," she said.

FOR TICKETS

Tickets for "Canterbury Tales" are on sale at the McCain Box Office and are priced at $18 for the public and faculty, $16 for citizens and $9 for students.

Richard Martin, director of McCain, cautions the production is not suited for younger audiences.

"It is inspired by the literary work of Chaucer, but it emphasizes the bawdier aspects, not the literary aspects," Martin said. "It's lusty, rambunctious and very much in the English spirit of Monty Python and Benny Hill."

The production is sponsored in part by the Kansas Arts Commission, the National Endowment for the Arts and the K-State arts fee.

Not all in agreement about budget

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Senators and House members assigned the task of drafting the final version of most of the next state budget finished their work Wednesday.

But that doesn't mean they agreed on everything before them.

Republicans plan to use a common procedural gimmick to get around opposition to several spending proposals from the ranking Democrat on the House Appropriations Committee, Rep. Henry Helgerson, D-Wichita.

And Sen. Gus Bogina, R-Shawnee, chairman of the Senate Ways and Means Committee, predicted that the entire Senate would reject a big portion of the budget — the appropriations for state universities.

Joint conference committees met for three days over 15 appropriations bills that contain most of the state's budget for its next fiscal year, which begins July 1. One key bill, which contains money to finance Gov. Bill Graves' proposal for a 3.5-percent pay raise for state workers, is scheduled for debate today in the House.

The negotiators' outlined a $7.7-billion budget, of which $3.4 billion would come from sales, income and excise taxes collected by the state in its general fund. They proposed about $4.3 million less in general fund spending than Graves.

Bogina said he was concerned about a conference committee's recommendations for the State Board of Regents and its institutions.

The committee agreed to cut $5.8 million from Graves' proposals because of lower than projected enrollments.

Candidate wants students to make best choice

Andrew Tomb, presidential candidate, said he hopes to distinguish himself from other candidates at the debate.

"Hopefully, people who are undecided will have a chance to listen to the candidates' views and make the best choice," Tomb said.

Scott Phillips, presidential candidate, also hopes students who have not had a chance to hear the candidates will come to make up their mind.

"The students who are undecided have a chance to see the candidates shoulder to shoulder and compare their views on the issues," Phillips said. "The students must decide what they are voting on, instead of who."

BRANDON PECK/COLLEGIAN

She hurt him, but wants him back

Dear Cassie,

My boyfriend and I broke up a month and a half ago. At the time, I didn't think I was ready for a serious relationship. He was. I did and said some stupid things, and he left.

I've tried dating a couple of guys since, but it's not the same. He's someone special. As corny as it sounds, he's one of the best things that has ever happened to me.

I am extremely sorry for the way I acted. We've talked a little but haven't really seen each other.

I'd like to see him again and work it out, but I think I really hurt him, and I don't know how I should handle this.

Signed, Madison

Dear Madison,

Sounds like you got a powerful amount of apologizing to do. Flowers, candy and some serious courting are the best way to say you're sorry.

Slamming Doors

A shutter moans;
wind chimes clatter.
The front gate's rusty hinges complain,
creaking back and forth.
A door I thought I had fastened slams open with a crash.

Haunting wind—unexpected intruder—bursts into my home,
down the hall,
pulling all the doors open,
one after another.
Pushing its way in,
leaving no corner untouched,
it clears away the cobwebs,
wipes off the layers of dust,
revealing the past,
bringing it back into the present.

Haunting wind—unexpected memory—
that shrieks into my mind,
throughout my heart,
wrenching all the doors open,
one after another.
Forcing its way in,
leaving no corner untouched,
it destroys fragile cobwebs, shatters the thin film of dust,
exposing the past,
shoving suddenly back into the present
all the memories I thought were safely stored away.

I struggle against the wind,
try to force the door closed,
but further down the hall
another door slams open ... and another ...
and another ...
and ...

Madrigal

Utter silence —
blurry streaks of purple, gold, pink — fearful patches of dim promises subdued in a confusing haze.
Smattering of clouds,
grey upon black,
meager threads of starlight filtering through their smothering embrace.
Autumn chill — fading colors —
utter silence —
lone observer of the uncertain moment between night and day.

Court upholds Army's removal of gay major from U.S. military

An officer sued to stop her removal from the Army after she admitted she had engaged in a homosexual relationship.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

FORT LEAVENWORTH — Army officials were uncertain Wednesday how long it might take for an officer ordered discharged for homosexuality to be dismissed.

The 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals denied an appeal from Maj. Joyce Walmer to block her removal from the military after admitting she had engaged in a homosexual relationship.

The appeals court Tuesday rejected in a 3-0 ruling her request for an injunction blocking her honorable discharge from the Army while she challenges the ruling. A Kansas federal court had denied her injunction request in 1993.

The 10th Circuit Court also dissolved a stay that had prevented the Army from discharging her while her appeal was pending.

Walmer remained on active duty and at work at Fort Leavenworth on Wednesday, said Janet Wray, a fort spokeswoman. It wasn't known when Walmer might be discharged, Wray said.

A telephone call to Walmer's attorney, Jeffrey L. Baxter of Leavenworth, wasn't returned to the Associated Press on Wednesday. But Baxter said Tuesday that Walmer could be discharged immediately. "It's likely — that's a real concern," he said.

Baxter said he would ask the court to reinstate the stay while he seeks to have all nine judges of the court reconsider Tuesday's decision.

In its ruling, the 10th Circuit Court cited a previous decision it had made rejecting a challenge of the Army's policy of discharging soldiers who had engaged in homosexual acts.

Last week, a New York federal judge declared the Clinton administration's "don't ask, don't tell" policy on gays in the military unconstitutional and barred the Pentagon from discharging six homosexuals. However, that did not affect the military's authority to discharge personnel who engaged in homosexual acts.

Walmer, who joined the Army in 1979, was accused by another woman of having a homosexual relationship in January 1992 while serving at Fort Leavenworth. Discharge proceedings were initiated against her.

During hearings before a board of inquiry, Walmer signed a stipulation acknowledging she had engaged in a homosexual relationship and stating her awareness that the board would be required to recommend her discharge.

Judge denies discussion of murder case

ASSOCIATED PRESS

JUNCTION CITY — A judge Wednesday left in place his order barring court personnel and law enforcement officials from discussing a murder case with reporters, and scheduled another hearing on the matter.

Geary County District Judge Larry Bengtson issued the order last week at the request of lawyers for one of three teenagers charged in the March 21 deaths of a mother and son who worked at a Junction City Pizza Hut.

Montgomery Publications Inc., parent company of the Daily Union and TV station KTMJ, has challenged the order as violating the media's First Amendment rights to gather information and at odds with U.S. Supreme Court rulings on press freedom and judges' authority.

At a hearing Wednesday covering several pre-trial publicity issues, Bengtson did not reverse the gag order and scheduled arguments on it for April 17.

Bengston said his order wasn't directed at the media.

"I have not gagged the press at all in this case, contrary to what I read in the media," Bengtson said. "Quite frankly, I empathize with the press."

The order says: "All court personnel, counsel and law enforcement officers are restrained, under pain of contempt, from discussing the factual allegations of this case with any representatives of the press."

Public defenders Ralph J. DeZago and Maritza Segarra, representing 18-year-old Christopher Everitt of Junction City, had cited "massive, highly prejudicial publicity" in seeking the gag order.

Everitt could be sentenced to death if convicted of capital murder in the deaths of Edeltraud "Trudy" Moore, 55, and Oscar Moore, 26. Their bodies were found March 21 in a Junction City Pizza Hut.

▶REPUBLICANS PUSH FOR TAX-CUT LEGISLATION

WASHINGTON (AP) — In a final flourish for the Contract With America, the House pushed toward passage Wednesday of Republican tax-cut legislation blending a $500-per-child tax credit with reductions sought by business interests. Democrats battled the measure as too generous to the rich.

"Under the Democrats, tax increases were the answer to every question," said Rep. Bill Archer, the conservative Texan who heads the tax-writing Ways and Means Committee. "When this bill is passed, the tax-raising legacy of President Clinton and his party will officially be over."

TIPS FOR WRITING A CLASSIFIED AD

Always put what item or service you are advertising first. This helps potential buyers find what they are looking for.

Don't use abbreviations. Many buyers are confused by abbreviations.

Consider including the price. This tells buyers if they are looking at something in their price range.

CATEGORIES

To help you find what you are looking for, the classified ads have been arranged by category and sub-category. All categories are marked by one of the large images, and sub-categories are preceded by a number designation.

"A coach that has to answer to an executive board is really a hindrance to a sports program," Koch said.

Conrad said she is concerned about who is ultimately responsible for decisions.

"The former adviser and I are concerned because of things that have happened in the past," Conrad said.

The KSRA does have a history of problems. They were put into serious financial debt by a past coach that has caused stress for the organization.

Ethel Strickland, original KSRA board member, said in 1991, the debt load exceeded $55,000.

During the hearing, questions were also raised concerning whether the rowers were following University policy on sexual and racial harassment.

Strickland said Binkowski and Koch thought it was best to handle the situation themselves. She said she believes people in their positions need to follow University policy.

Koch said there is a wide variety of people on the crew, and some of the rowers' language, in addition to the way they used it toward members of the opposite sex, was not appropriate.

"There are two individuals who have made comments to or about women. I talked to them about it and told them that we didn't need it in this organization," Koch said.

Ransone said some of the problems started when an argument between the men's and women's coaches was witnessed by the crew.

"There was visible static between the coaches," Ransone said.

Koch said he and Jennifer Franklin, the women's coach, have a difference of opinion on more things than he can count.

"I teach competitiveness and hard work, while Jenn believes in the rowers having fun," Koch said.

Franklin said she wants to instill self-confidence in her rowers.

"I come from the East, where rowing is based on honor, loyalty, self-motivation and drive," Franklin said.

She said she wanted to help bring some change for the team.

"All I wanted was an equal coaching status and not to have my job threatened on a daily basis," Franklin said.

She said she had a problem with what she believes was the condescending and patronizing way Koch treated her.

The two coaches also have differences in the techniques they teach the rowers.

Franklin said Koch's techniques are outdated, and the way he teaches could cause back injuries to the rowers.

Koch said he teaches things the way he was taught does not think the technique causes injuries.

"I would not teach it if I thought it would," Koch said.

Franklin said Koch's technique is not the U.S. Rowing Association's standard technique.

Franklin said she wishes the University would either help the team or close it down.

She said the equipment is being misused and could be unsafe for the rowers.

"What I am afraid of is that somebody is going to have to die before they pull this," Franklin said.

A decision has been reached by the UAB and will be released on Monday.

Help, hope can prevent suicidal act

they're thinking about killing or hurting themselves and then to find out if they already have a plan.

"They're at a greater risk if they have thought about it enough to have a plan," she said. "Then you ask yourself if the plan is immediate and accessible."

It's important for someone at risk to get back a sense of hope.

"If you're thinking about it, get help," Benton said.

"Get back a sense of hope and get back the feeling that things will get better."

Benton also has advice for those who have had to deal with a suicide.

"Steer clear of finger-pointing," she said. "If there was any inkling of idea that someone was about to do this, anyone would have done anything they could."

Suicide or accident is the highest probable cause of death among the college population, ages 18 to 25, Fred Newton, director of Counseling Services, said.

"That's because they're the younger population, so they're not dying from illness causes," he said.

Although five seems like a large number, it's not in comparison to K-State's population, Newton said.

"In the 15 years I've been here, I don't think we've had a year when there wasn't a suicide," Newton said. "In a population of 20,000, one to six suicides a year is a very small number."

Because of the small percentage, there is no pattern that can be detected.

"There is no trend you can decipher out of such a small percent," Newton said. "It's a minute number, but suicide has such a ripple effect from it because it is so traumatic."

Newton said one of the reasons suicide is so traumatic is because it happens so quickly with little indication.

Bingo approval may help lottery issue

TOPEKA — A bill implementing the instant bingo amendment was approved on Tuesday by voters. The bill may become the vehicle for a Senate effort to get the House to agree to make the Kansas Lottery a permanent state agency.

Continuation of the lottery has become a political football this session. It will expire on July 1, 1996, unless the Legislature acts to give it new life.

Both Senate Majority Leader Jerry Moran, R-Hays, and Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan, chairwoman of the Senate Federal and State Affairs Committee, said on Wednesday that the lottery issue and legislation to implement the bingo amendment could get wedded in the Senate.

"We were waiting to see whether the citizens approved the amendment," Moran said. "We've also kind of been waiting to see what happens to the lottery in the House."

"We're kind of concerned about the lottery," Oleen said. "It could get tied to the bingo legislation."

The bingo amendment won voter approval with 58 percent of the vote on Tuesday, 241,520 for it to 174,667 against. But it takes legislative action to implement the amendment and set the regulations under which nonprofit religious, charitable, veterans and fraternal organizations can offer the pull-tab tickets.

The Senate passed a bill on Feb. 23 that would have continued the lottery in existence indefinitely. The House amended the bill twice, including letting it continue for six years and allowing the lottery to operate slot machines as parimutuel race tracks, but refused to advance it to a final vote.

It remains bogged down on the House debate calendar.

The Senate Federal and State Affairs Committee endorsed the instant bingo implementation bill on Feb. 3, but that measure was left on the Senate debate calendar awaiting Tuesday's vote.

Senators may amend a provision to make the lottery permanent into the bingo bill when it comes up for debate, possibly on Thursday or Friday when the Legislature returns to finish work on the regular portion of the 1995 session. First adjournment is scheduled for late Friday.

The gyrations over extending the life of the lottery may mean supporters of instant, or pull-tab, bingo

Investment program focus of bill

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Legislative negotiators Wednesday drafted a compromise version of a bill that will limit the state treasurer's discretion in managing an investment program for local units of government.

The bill generally restricts the types of investments that can be made on behalf of depositors in the Municipal Investment Pool. A spokeswoman for State Treasurer Sally Thompson was unenthusiastic about the proposal but said the treasurer's office could live with it.

The proposal was drafted by a joint conference committee, three senators and three House members, assigned to work out differences between the two houses. The House will consider the compromise first, then the Senate, both by the end of the week. If both approve, it will go to Gov. Bill Graves.

Although Thompson, a Democrat, and her staff have raised questions about the motives of Republicans pushing the legislation, GOP legislators say they are trying to make the pool safer. From July 1994 through February 1995, the pool suffered $19 million in losses from trading securities.

"Legislative intervention here has become of paramount interest and importance," said Sen. Dick Bond, R-Overland Park, chairman of the conference committee.

Thompson and her staff have said they plan to make up the losses by earning more for the pool with new investments of its deposits. But Assistant Treasurer JoLana Pinon acknowledged Wednesday that the recovery will take some time.

Thompson has blamed the pool's problems on rapidly increasing interest rates in 1994, which, as they rose, made the pool's investments less attractive by making better earnings better elsewhere. However, an audit questioned whether Thompson was too aggressive in her investment strategy in 1992 and 1993, then got burned last year.

Pinon also acknowledged that in March, pool deposits dropped from $762 million to $589 million.

"We think the uncertainty because of the Legislature has led some people not to renew with us," she said. "I think there's still some uneasiness out there. There's been a fear that this thing might be shut down."

The most important provision of the legislation would limit the term of investments.

Under the bill, after July 1, 1996, the average weighted maturity of the pool's investments could not be more than 90 days after the investments are made. However,

Mourning a friend

By Sara Lunday

More than 50 friends and family members celebrated and mourned the death of John Gaieski during a memorial service Thursday night at All Faiths Chapel.

Gaieski, a freshman in engineering, was found dead of a self-inflicted gunshot wound at Tuttle Creek Reservoir March 31.

Students from fourth-floor Goodnow Hall, Gaieski's residence, organized the service to express how they felt about Gaieski, said Don Fallon, coordinator of campus religious activities.

Poetry, songs and letters were presented to Gaieski's family, who traveled from Olathe for the service. Donna Gaieski, John's mother, said sharing the burden of her son's grief helped her share the joy of his life.

"The outpouring of love and the sharing of John's life is just overwhelming," she said.

Tasa Chatman, freshman in pre-journalism and mass communications, said she chose to sing "His Eye Is on the Sparrow" a cappella because she wanted to remind others that there is life after death.

Laughter and tears filled the chapel during a time of personal remembrances.

Scott Harper, freshman in mechanical engineering, said he remembered Gaieski as being like a hawk — bold, strong and beautiful.

Mike Stecher, freshman in pre-health professions program, said he would never forget Gaieski's competitive spirit that he expressed when playing cards and weight lifting.

"And now I'm going to try living my life the way he did — 100 percent," Stecher said.

Others had a chance to share anonymously by writing on pieces of paper that were read during the service.

People wrote that Gaieski would be remembered for Street Fighter raids, a soft 'hello,' drinking coffee and eating many vegetables.

"His smile radiated through the halls and through us," one anonymous card said.

Tribunal rules on funding case

MICHELLE BELCHER
Collegian

Student Tribunal ruled Thursday that Student Senate was in violation of a general funding regulation.

The funding regulation that was violated was Section A, No. 3. It states: Student Senate shall make no consideration of the viewpoint or viewpoints expressed by a group requesting funding from Student Governing Association when considering funding requests.

Senate was found not guilty of violating Section A, No. 2. It states that Senate cannot discriminate on grounds of race, sex, nationality, sexual orientation and other non-merit reasons when considering funding.

Request for funding by the group Metazine for an alternative magazine was denied by Senate on March 2. Metazine filed a complaint after the denial.

David Kromm, president of Metazine, said senators made insinuations about the magazine's content during the March 2 meeting. The magazine contained a picture of a nude male.

"My sense was that two senators unfairly characterized the magazine and unfairly prejudiced Senate as a whole," Phillip Anderson, faculty representative to Student Senate, said.

Senate chair Clayton Wheeler called the two senators out of order during the discussion about funding the magazine.

"Senate did follow everything that should have been followed to the letter," Wheeler said.

Tribunal chancellor Kathryn Wesolowsky said Tribunal ruled that the Senate chairman was found negligent in his failure to physically remove the magazine that caused the inappropriate debate from the Student Senate chamber.

The Metazine magazine prototype was brought into the chamber

Senate votes to appeal decision of Tribunal

AMY SIMON
Collegian

Student Senate decided to appeal a decision of the Tribunal at its meeting Thursday evening.

Tribunal found Senate in violation of its funding regulations when it failed to allocate money to Metazine, a student publishing group.

Clayton Wheeler, Senate chair, announced the informal decision that found Senate in violation of a guideline that prohibits discrimination against groups on the basis of their political views.

Kathryn Wesolowsky, chancellor of Tribunal, was called in to present the decision and answer questions from senators.

This decision is not binding on Senate but is only a recommendation for future actions, Wesolowsky said.

Even if these decisions are not binding, they still set a dangerous precedent, Wheeler said.

Wheeler and other SGA members said they were particularly troubled by a recommendation that would only allow Allocations Committee to see specific information about a group.

Several senators argued this recommendation violates the SGA constitution, which gives all senators the right to examine such records.

"I feel this decision sets a precedent that will be binding with future decisions," Wheeler said.

Tribunal will formally present

New program offers research opportunities

SARA SMITH
Collegian

As downsizing puts military veterans in the civilian work force, a few of them will have the chance to be retrained for jobs in the environmental field.

A program called Research and Re-education for Displaced Department of Defense personnel, or R2D2, is providing skilled veterans with research opportunities at 29 universities.

Although K-State is one of those universities, only one student is slated to begin the R2D2 program in May.

Kent Russell, graduate student in chemistry, said R2D2 has provided him with a chance to do research after getting out of the military.

"The R2D2 program is just a way of taking veterans who are getting out of military service and providing them with resources to get into an environmental career," he said.

Russell worked in the military as a chemical officer from 1989 to 1992.

"I was a chemical officer, and my primary job was concerned with chemical warfare and protecting our soldiers from exposure to chemical agents," he said.

Russell, who is now in the Army Reserves, said he was affected by the downsizing of the military.

"After Desert Storm, there was a huge amount of downsizing going on," he said.

Christian groups sponsor festivities

K-State students who see the need for recognition and awareness of Jesus Christ have planned a week of festivities for all students to get involved.

The week is being sponsored by several Christian groups on campus. Some of those groups include ICTHUS and InterVarsity Christian Fellowship.

"We all got together to plan this," said Amy Steanson, senior in English.

Tara Ericson, junior in elementary education, said there was talk about how many awareness weeks there are and because of that, several people got together to plan a Jesus Christ awareness week.

The first annual Jesus forum at K-State is going on because of several reasons, Ericson said.

"People should know about him historically, and he should be celebrated," she said.

Another reason the week is being sponsored is because there is a need to bring Christ on cam-

As presidential and vice presidential candidates were quizzed on the issues at a forum in Derby Food Center Thursday night, differences among the candidates emerged.

Questions about parking, the physical-education requirement, campus safety and the prospect of the University going to a user-fee system were all asked by Lin Bliss, president of the Kansas State University Association of Residence Halls.

Scott Butler, junior in mathematics and a resident of Putnam Hall, said all the candidates had similar views, except for presidential candidate Jeff Peterson's view on a user-fee system.

Only Peterson supported implementing a user-fee system that would charge people for the activities they used, such as Lafene Health Center, McCain programming and the Collegian.

The other candidates either wanted to research it more or were against it.

NEWS BRIEFS

▶ RESIDENCE HALLS TO FLING INTO SPRING WITH WEEKEND GAMES, RACES

Spring will be officially welcomed this weekend on the K-State campus by the residence halls' annual Spring Fling.

The event, which is sponsored by Kansas State University Association of Residence Halls, is undergoing changes and keeping traditions this year during its activities, said Bridget Porter, director of Moore Hall and KSUARH adviser.

One change includes condensing the event into a weekend instead of having it last a week.

"I think it will go better as a weekend to draw your attention, and we can publicize each event," said Julia Trowbridge, sophomore in architectural engineering and chairperson of Spring Fling.

Some of the old games will remain in addition to the new activities. The Family Feud and Roommate games are on the agenda, and so is the bed race.

"The bed race is a big traditional one that has been done for years and years and years," Trowbridge said.

Old yearbooks and newspaper articles helped Trowbridge to choose from a long list of what had been attempted and tried in years past when picking events this year, she said.

The 1960s theme of Catstock represents the desire to bring back those earlier days when Spring Fling was a big event that everyone looked forward to, Trowbridge said.

"I think it's lost its name, and we wanted to bring it back," she said.

The events will be throughout campus to involve all of the residence halls.

"There are events all over the campus, in all of the complexes and even in the Union," Porter said.

The events are open to all students in the residence halls, but they are on a pre-register basis. However, anyone can come and watch, Trowbridge said.

"The goal of Spring Fling is some competition and fun, but the purpose is to bring the residence halls together," Porter said.

Eric Keen, junior in mechanical engineering and president of KSUARH, said he encourages people to participate in the weekend.

"Overall, it's going to be a big weekend for the residence halls. I know a lot of hard work has been put in as well as money, as long as the residents show up," he said.

▶ PANDA PARLAYS DAMAGED PLASTIC INTO ESCAPE OPPORTUNITY

A rare red panda broke loose from Sunset Zoological Park Thursday afternoon. The 9-month-old red panda exploited a wind-damaged piece of transparent plastic on its cage to get out. Zoo officials expect it to stay in the area.

Don Wixom, zoo director, said zoo employees spent two hours scouring the zoo and surrounding area for the red panda. People hunting for the panda will need to look up, he said, because they prefer living in trees.

"But the truth is," Wixom said, "this little guy could hide anywhere."

Mike Quick, general curator, said he could still be on the ground.

"He could be any place dark — in a hole, a pipe — anywhere it'll feel safe," he said.

Angie Fenstermacher, marketing director, said she hopes the community can continue its support for the zoo and pull together to help in the search.

Red pandas look a lot like raccoons, right down to the ringed tails, except they are red and have rounder heads.

Wixom said if you find the missing red panda to call the Riley County Police Department at 537-2111.

"If you find him," Wixom said, "keep your eye on him."

Wixom said the pandas are shy, but they have very sharp claws and teeth and could give a nasty bite.

▶ LIBERALS REJECT PARTY COMPROMISE

WASHINGTON (AP) — Senate leaders sought to revive a stalled $15-billion package of cuts in social programs after liberal Democrats balked at a potential compromise.

Majority Leader Bob Dole, R-Kan., and Minority Leader Tom Daschle, D-S.D., labored to find middle ground on Thursday.

Democrats had rejected a tentative deal the two men — with the backing of President Clinton — had struck Wednesday night.

That agreement would have protected programs for children, housing and jobs from some Republican-sought cuts.

It would have also slashed other programs even deeper, raising its total savings to $16 billion.

▶ AMTRAK MAKES SERVICE CUTBACKS

WASHINGTON (AP) — The train called the City of New Orleans will be cut to five days a week; the Broadway Limited to Chicago will end at Pittsburgh; and Houston residents who want to ride the Texas Eagle north will have to start with a bus trip to Dallas.

Amtrak dropped the other shoe Thursday, announcing a series of service cuts scheduled to take place in June and September as the passenger railroad tries to eliminate red ink.

Without the cutbacks, which will total 24 percent of the routes when complete, Amtrak might have been facing bankruptcy by midsummer, Thomas Downs, president of the railroad, said.

▶ DEADLY VIRUS STILL BEING RESEARCHED

WASHINGTON (AP) — The mystery disease that killed 14 horses and a horse trainer in Australia last fall was caused by a highly virulent new virus that jumps from animals to humans, scientists said.

But the scientists have no idea where it originated or how big a threat it poses.

The still-unnamed virus is part of the family that includes measles and canine distemper, Australian researchers reported last Friday in the journal Science.

But it's more deadly and has a particularly disturbing element:

Until now, all viruses in this particular family had been confined to just a single species.

Jason Dechant, sophomore in pre-law, and Jason Cole, junior in philosophy and political science, announce their political party, Jason², Thursday afternoon on the east side of Ahearn Field House.

Jasons enter Senate race

JILL TEQTMEIER
Collegian

Ahearn Field House is where students spend their money, and a new political party wants to find out where it goes, Jason Dechant said during the announcement of a political party, Jason², Thursday morning.

Dechant, sophomore in pre-law, and Jason Cole, junior in philosophy and political science, said the east side of Ahearn facing the K-State Union was specially chosen as the spot to declare their candidacies for arts and science senators.

"That is where fees are paid, and we want to hold Student Senate and the Kansas Legislature more accountable for what happens to that money," Dechant said.

Cole said the party is concerned with tuition.

"Tuition is a big deal. Every year we see fees increase, increase, increase. Our priority is to level out the tuition price and bring financial aid back where students have access to it and can afford it," Cole said.

The Jason² candidates said although issues such as parking and safety are important, theses issues don't matter if students' tuition is not dealt with effectively first.

"If you are priced out of an education, these other issues don't matter. Affordable tuition is important to everyone whether you receive financial aid or not," Cole said.

Cole said both he and Dechant feel they have a voice for students of K-State because they have personal and professional ties with most of the legislators in Topeka.

"Jason and I have both served on the Legislative Affairs Committee and have been interns for the Legislature," Cole said.

Dechant said their goal is to get accountability and representation by Student Senate and the Legislature.

"One of our ideas is to establish a town meeting kind of setting with representatives from every housing organization. There is no reason why decisions need to be made by the Student Senate alone," he said.

Cole said it is time to get a student on the Kansas Board of Regents.

"We need to have a voice so we can promote our interests and not that of the regents or Legislature," he said.

Jason² said they are endorsing Liz Ring and Paul Friedrichs for president and vice president.

"A candidate is indicative of the campaign they run. Liz has run an organized, ethical and successful campaign thus far. We believe K-State would be nothing short of being very fortunate to have Liz and Paul leading the student body in the future," Dechant said.

Although Dechant and Cole said they are first and foremost concerned with the issue of tuition, they said they have ideas to increase campus safety and deal with the parking problem.

"Our door will be open to students on any issue that arises," Cole said.

Students for Students, a party made up of students running for Board of Student Publications, discuss their goals for the board when they announced their party Thursday.

Party unveils platform

LISA ELLIOTT
Collegian

Five candidates for the Board of Student Publications unveiled their party platform Thursday morning.

"We're Students for Students, and the five of us are running for the Board of Student Publications," party member Ben Clouse, senior in accounting, said.

Aaron Otto, sophomore in political science and business; Lin Bliss, junior in history and pre-medicine; Russell Wilson, junior in journalism and mass communications; and Jake Arnett, sophomore in engineering undecided, are the other four members of the party.

Clouse said one goal of the party is to bring student thought and input into the board meetings and the Collegian and Royal Purple.

Party members come from all over campus and represent both on- and off-campus students as well as the greek system, Clouse said.

"I think it's really important to bring student input to the Board of Student Publications," Bliss said.

Part of their platform includes making the chairman of the board a student and making all committee chairs students, he said.

Bliss said Students for Students would like to see students have more of a voice in the operations of the board and its publications.

Another change proposed is adding the editors of the Royal Purple and the Collegian to the board as ex-officio members, Wilson said.

This change would allow board members and students to better understand the operations of the Collegian and Royal Purple, he said.

The addition of an open period at every meeting would allow students or student groups to bring their concerns directly to the board instead of relaying information through board members, Wilson said.

"Jake and I get people coming to us all the time and talking to us about the Collegian or Royal Purple," Otto said.

Otto and Arnett are members of the board this year. Otto said he and Arnett relay the concerns they hear from students to the board, but having students come in would be more effective.

Clouse said he tells students who bring concerns about issues before Student Senate that it would mean more if the students brought the concerns instead of relaying it through them.

If the open period were a part of the meeting, members could invite students to bring their concerns directly to the members of the board, Clouse said.

As with all student-funded groups, fiscal responsibility is of great concern, Arnett said.

He said members of the party

IN OUR OPINION

by the Collegian Editorial

SGA candidates should respect campus

These off-campus activities should not have been done without the permission of individuals living in those dwellings.

To keep elections fair, candidates in Student Senate elections have a responsibility to follow guidelines set by the Elections Committee.

Unfortunately, the rules governing on-campus campaigning have been broken this year.

In addition, there have been some activities off campus that could be considered an invasion of privacy.

Unauthorized campaign signs have been hung up in many of the buildings on campus.

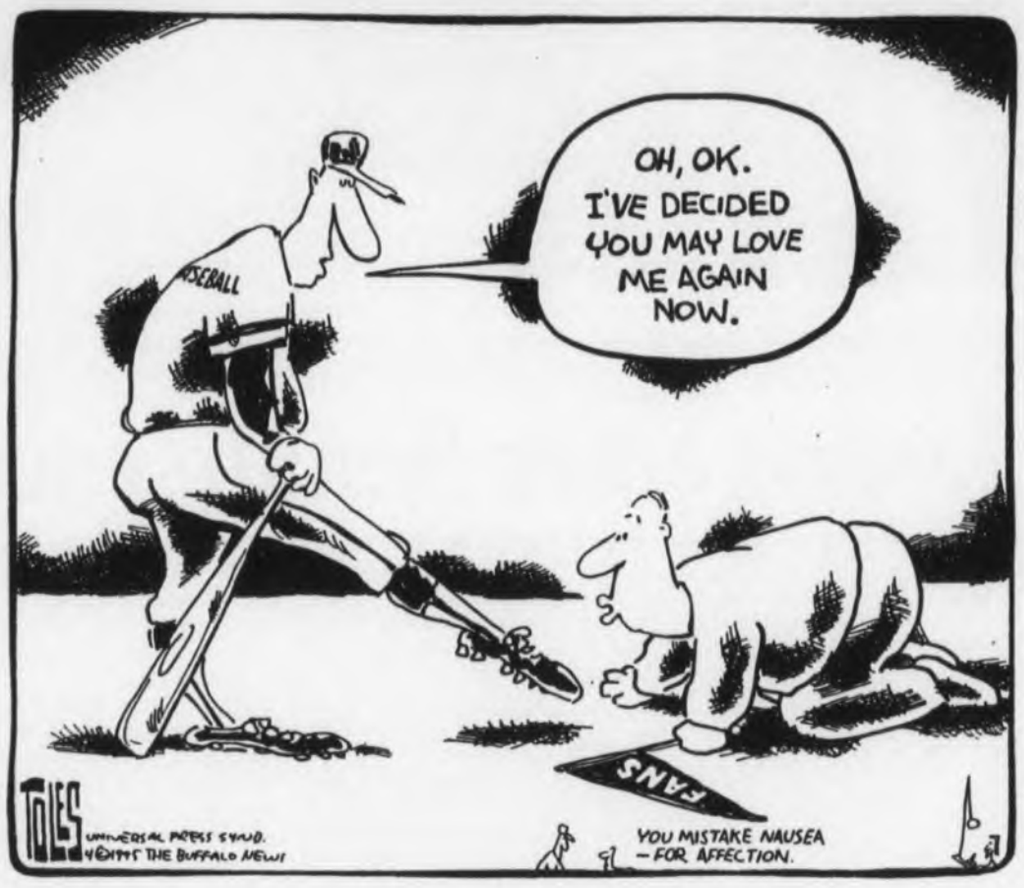
Signs have not been properly mounted with all four corners down to keep signs from littering campus grounds.

In addition, posted campaign signs have been placed on the doors of some apartment complexes where students live.

Greek houses have had candidates drawing chalk messages on their driveways.

These off-campus activities by candidates should not have been done without the permission of individuals living in those dwellings.

They might not want to appear like they are endorsing a certain candidate.



It might be easy for a candidate to say everyone else is doing it, but that is no excuse to violate campaign regulations, litter the campus and disturb the privacy of others.

Candidates should be respectful of others.

Campaign rules were made for a reason, and that is to do things without disturbing the campus or students.

Hopefully, candidates will obey them.

Candidates want year-to-year consistency in government

STUDENT ELECTIONS '95

We are only running for student body president and vice president for the purpose of serving students. We want to bring a new paradigm of thinking into Student Governing Association. It is a shame that there is virtually no record-keeping or long-term planning going on in our student government. Every year, the administration likes to dust off another plan, hand it to students and let them pay for it. We need to define a clear strategy for the way student government will spend future students' fee money.

1. Campus and community safety

We believe all students have the right to feel completely safe at all times, whether on or off campus.

Efforts to control crime cannot stop at the borders of the campus. They must stem from cooperation between the campus and local community.

We advocate expansion of the existing escort service to off-campus areas through the cooperation of the residence halls, greek houses and apartment complexes.

In addition, we will create a City-University Task Force on Crime and Safety, so students, administration, faculty and staff can open a dialogue with the city leaders and the law-enforcement community to work on things like on- and off-campus safety, crime prevention and rental inspection.

If we want to get serious about issues like safety and taxes, we will need to become constituents of the city leaders before they will take us seriously.

2. Parking

A parking garage looks like a reality, but not until 1999. The location and financing of this garage are decisions that can be worked toward during my administration. We are against the placement of the garage in Memorial Stadium and the undue rise in the cost of parking permits being used to finance its construction. One alternative we would like to study would be getting an outside business to construct and manage the garage, charging only the people who use the garage to park there.

We need some short-term strategies to deal with the current problem, so our administration will be doing everything possible to have the eight short-term recommendations of the Parking Task Force implemented as soon as possible. These recommendations include making the campus more bicycle-friendly, reducing the number of reserved stalls, placing state-owned vehicles away from campus and scheduling classes with respect to parking needs.

3. No added fees for bicyclists

Since people using bicycles are not causing the parking problem, we will work with the administration to provide bicyclists with a guarantee that they will not charge us to ride to campus. Forcing permits and registration on bicyclists not only discourages their use, but it also adds to the parking crisis.

We do not advocate that bicyclists register their bikes with the K-State Police for planning and anti-theft purposes but that no fee ever be collected for this service. You can do it now for free, and that should be continued.

4. Continue to register K-State students to vote in Riley County.

With the recent annexation of K-State to the city of Manhattan, students have become even greater contributors to the local tax base. Unfortunately, that increased taxation has not been complemented with more student representation in county and local government and is unlikely to unless we get K-State students registered to vote.

Not only has the local government dragged its feet in assisting K-State in solving the parking crisis, they have proved they would also enjoy taking advantage of the transient nature of the local economy by proposing sales-tax increases for capital improvements to the city, i.e., the jail tax of last November.

If we want to get serious about issues like safety and taxes, we will need to become constituents of the city leaders before they will take us seriously.

5. State government issues

It's no secret that we are at the forefront of a more conservative budgeting era. For higher education to survive, students must continue to have a presence in its funding by maintaining contact with regents, legislators and administrators. Again, like local issues, the best way to do this is for students to become constituents of the people in charge.

That's why we propose to make registering more student voters the No. 1 priority for any student-lobbying effort under our administration. By registering more student voters, we can directly influence our elected officials during the budget process, regent selection and other K-State related interests.

We need to negotiate a funding deal with the Kansas Board of Regents and the Legislature that will protect student costs and yet allow the University to continue to improve itself in areas like faculty salaries, classroom facilities and student services.

In this plan, we will argue for a 15-hour cap on the linear fees proposal and an arrangement to protect the percentage students pay at state schools.

If you ever have any questions, comments or suggestions for our campaign, do not hesitate to call us at 587-0370 (Andrew) or 587-9441, or catch us in front of the K-State Union during the election.

We will continue the same accessibility we have maintained during this campaign in our administration.

One of the things we want to do is take the door off the office.

Andy Tomb, presidential candidate
Mark Tomb, vice presidential candidate

▶ ROWING TEAM

No one should shut down team

Dear editor,

Shut down KSRA? Whose stupid idea is that? As was stated in your article in the April 6 Collegian, KSRA is a club; therefore the students choose to join, and if they don't like it, they can leave.

"Coach Koch is a very good coach, so he makes us work hard."

KEVIN KEMPTON
sophomore in sociology

I am on the crew team, novice men's, and I don't understand what Coach Franklin meant when she said the equipment was being misused. There isn't much you can do with the boats we have, other than row them on calm water; what does she think we do, sneak off and go white water rafting with them or something? Wait 'till someone gets killed? I don't think so. Everyone on the team had to pass swimming qualifications, and that is the only way I could see anyone dying from rowing (falling out the boat and drowning).

Coach Koch is a very good coach, so he makes us work hard. What is the matter with a little hard work? If the technique he teaches could hurt our backs, and it is the technique back when he rowed, then shouldn't his back be all messed up? Coach Koch is in very good shape; on occasion, he works out with us when he can, so I don't see his technique as a problem.

I'm not sure if even Coach Franklin is with KSRA. I thought she left; I haven't seen her. From what I've heard/seen, she told the women's team to quit, and it appears they did. We only have like 10 to 12 women (if that) now, and five or so are juniors, so can Ms. Franklin's statements be truly trusted?

As for the sexual harassment thing, Coach Koch has pulled me aside and told me not to be telling certain types of jokes out at the boathouse, and I've tried to quit. It's hard for Coach Koch to be able to censor what anyone else says, especially when he isn't always in the vicinity.

Shut down KSRA? Why?

Collegian gives unfair coverage

Dear editor,

I believed you when you wrote a big editorial spouting off about how the Collegian was not going to endorse any candidates or show any favoritism toward anyone. Well, looks like you were wrong.

Your story in Thursday's paper about a student body president's home page on the World Wide Web gave one candidate more press and more notoriety than the other candidates have received.

Printing that article was unfair to the rest of the candidates. You have broken your word.

Never mind that the candidate is associated with the Collegian. That probably wasn't a factor in your decision to print the story, I imagine.

In fact, I really like the candidate in question. Heck of a guy. I like all of the candidates. I'm even supporting one of them.

I do not, however, want a candidate to have special privileges of free publicity.

Residents betting on good turnout for Casino Night

JANICE MELIA
Collegian

Place your bets.

The 12th-annual Marlatt Hall Casino Night will be from 8 p.m. to midnight Saturday in the K-State Union Main Ball Room.

The event is co-sponsored by West Hall.

"Marlatt is our brother hall, and they asked if we would help sponsor it," Julie Miller, junior in elementary education, said.

Individuals are given play money to gamble with at either craps, blackjack, roulette or poker, said Tom Cruz, senior in civil engineering and events coordinator for Marlatt.

"It's a fun time to act like a big spender," Cruz said.

Throughout the evening, the money won can be used to buy prizes that will be auctioned off to the highest bidder.

The prizes have been donated by about 50 area businesses, Cruz said.

"It's a lot of fun to throw out $100 just to lose it," Cruz said.

Those losing money can return once to get more money, he said.

Miller said she expects the games to be the best part of the evening along with the atmosphere.

That atmosphere will be enhanced by dealers and security people who will be walking around as well.

"We want to make sure everything is handled smoothly and that people don't cheat," said Jeremy Rogge, junior in accounting and vice president of Marlatt.

Also, live music by Lunar Tunes will allow people to dance if they want, Rogge said.

Refreshments, including chili con queso, cookies and pop, will be served, Rogge said.

Even people who don't know how to play the game can watch and catch on really easily, Rogge said.

CASINO NIGHT
The 12th-annual Marlatt Hall Casino Night will be at 8 p.m. to midnight Saturday in the K-State Union Main Ball Room.

"Most people know how to play blackjack," he said.

The free event is not limited to residence hall members. It is open to Manhattan residents, faculty and staff, the greek system and anyone else who wishes to attend, Cruz said.

In years past, the event has been attended by 400 to 600 people.

"It's a lot of fun. Everybody is invited. We usually have a really good turnout," Rogge said.

Program for veterans offered at 29 universities

Stan Grant, the associate director of the Hazardous Substance Research Center at K-State and national program director for R2D2, said R2D2 was set up to help people like Russell.

"A goodly portion of those people have skills that don't have civilian counterparts," Grant said.

Although Grant said he hopes there will be a total of 300 people in the program at all the colleges by the end of the year, the program isn't in full swing yet.

"Most of them will be starting in the summer or fall," he said.

Russell said he has an outline for the work he will be doing, which is mostly related to agriculture.

"At Kansas State University, the environmental research is largely agricultural because it's an ag school," he said.

Russell said he will be working in two areas. One of his projects will require him to write computer programs to show the interaction and exchange of chemicals between a crop field and the environment.

Russell will also be working with pesticides and fertilizer, researching ways to keep helpful chemicals in crop fields with the use of plants.

Russell, who had worked in environmental physics before he went into the military, said R2D2 was giving him a chance to concentrate on research.

"It provides people like myself with a quality research program and also some funding," he said. "Without the program, then that leaves you to teach on a GTA program."

To qualify for the R2D2 program, the student must first be admitted to one of the 29 universities in the program.

Once they are admitted, they then have to apply to the relevant Hazardous Substance Research Center.

Once accepted, students in R2D2 receive tuition reimbursement and financial support for research and equipment.

Local bands perform at benefit concert

MELINDA CARTER
Collegian

A group of about 300 people crowded into Snookie's Bar Wednesday night to listen to the music of Whipping Brady, Coolerspoon and Bosom at the Tomb Benefit Concert.

Andrew Tomb, senior in political science, and Mark Tomb, sophomore in economics, are running for student body president and vice president.

The concert was sponsored by Snookie's and the supporters of Tomb for Presidency and was organized to cover campaign costs.

Whipping Brady opened the concert with the song "Molly's Lips" by Nirvana, followed by about 10 songs, including some of the group's own.

This band likes to mimic the sounds of bands like Weezer and Violent Femmes and has been performing since August.

The three-person band is made up of drummer James Renfroe, senior in marketing; bass guitarist James Wilson, junior in English; and guitarist and vocalist Rob Gillespie, senior in psychology.

There was some disappointment in the crowd from the start.

"I wish the crowd would have gotten into it a little more. Sometimes they did; sometimes they just sat there," Renfroe said.

After a brief intermission, Coolerspoon took the stage and was greeted with instant approval.

There was little to no talk between songs as the group flowed from one piece to another. Energy flowed from the stage to the dance floor while people danced to the music.

At one point, fans were sliding across the floor on their stomachs and backs.

Coolerspoon entertained the crowd with songs by Pearl Jam and Nirvana and a few of their own titled "Fieldtrip," "Ink" and "Inbred."

Coolerspoon is made up of vocalist Stan Castaneda, sophomore in graphic design; guitarist Matt Marron, freshman undecided; guitarist Travis Worden, freshman in business; and drummer Kris Seymour, freshman in elementary education.

Members of Coolerspoon also said they wished the crowd would have been a little more alive.

"We were pleased with the sound, but we wish the crowd would have gotten into it more," Marron said.

During the intermission between Coolerspoon and Bosom, Tomb gave a small speech to thank the crowd for being there.

In his speech, Tomb made a promise to the fans at Snookie's.

He said, "I promise that if you make me your next student body president, there will be more bands for less money."

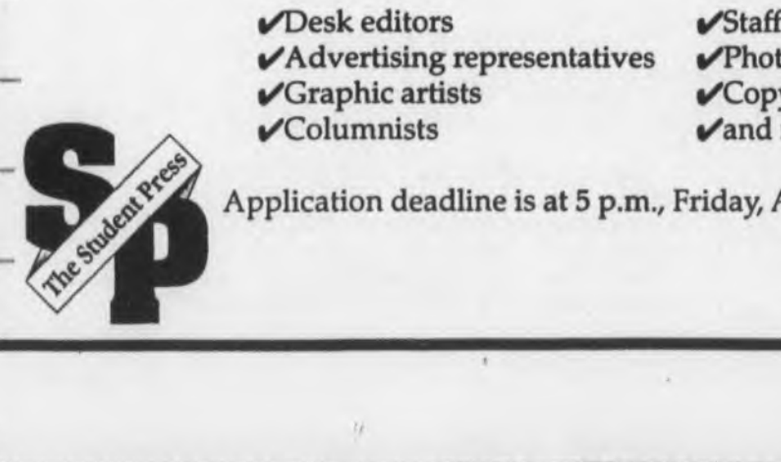
At that moment, Bosom took the stage, and the dance floor became swamped with fans.

This band captured the audience's attention throughout its entire performance.

Bosom sang songs off their old and new albums, including "Jackass," "Mutton-bustin" "Two Trucks Ago" and "701."

Michael Calloway, junior in construction science and Bosom's drummer, said Bosom was established in 1991, but it has changed members about six times.

The current members include Calloway; guitarist Jason Hutto, senior in radio and television; bass guitarist Larry Hafner, junior in electrical engineering; and vocalist and bass guitarist Jason McLendon, junior in geology.



Calloway said although the band hasn't played in Manhattan since November, the turnout was great.

Cats take 2 from Doane College

NICOLE POELL
Collegian

Another week, another streak.

The K-State baseball team made it four in a row for the second consecutive week after sweeping a doubleheader against Doane College of Crete, Neb., Thursday night. The Wildcats overpowered the Tigers in both contests by the scores of 17-8 and 13-1.

Doane got on the board first, scoring two runs in the first inning. But the Cats answered in a big way, scoring two runs in their half of the first and crossing the plate nine times in the second, bringing the score up to 11-2.

While Doane managed to score again in the third, sixth and seventh innings, it wasn't enough to catch up to the Cats, who led 13-6 going into the bottom of the sixth.

Doane 8

K-State 13
Doane 1

That's when K-State sophomore Mike Gardner put the icing on the cake for the Cats with a grand-slam home run, giving his team the 17-8 win. Gardner was hot throughout the game, going 4-for-5 on the night, something K-State coach Mike Clark took note of.

"Gardner hit the ball extremely well for us tonight," Clark said. "He did a good job."

Recording the win for K-State was Marc Lowery, who moves to 1-0 on the season.

The second game of the day saw Cats pitcher Kevin Wicker throw a one-hitter in K-State's 13-1 victory. The Cats jumped in front early in the contest, scoring three runs in the first inning. After scoring again in the second and fourth innings, the Cat bats were relatively quiet until the sixth, when eight K-State runs crossed the plate. Wicker retired the Tiger side 1-2-3 at the top of the seventh to get his first win of the season.

Despite his team's victories, Coach Clark said he wasn't satisfied with the Cats' overall play.

"Our first game was just a win, and I wasn't real happy with our offense in the second game," he said. But Clark said he is hoping the Cats can extend their second winning streak during the weekend series against the Sooners.

"For the most part, we've been putting together some stretches of good games," Clark said. "We just need to extend that."

K-State swept Oklahoma earlier this week and is looking to Continue its success in Norman

NICOLE POELL
Collegian

After sweeping the 10th-ranked defending national champion Oklahoma Sooners this week, what could the K-State baseball team possibly do for an encore?

How about beating the Sooners on the road?

The Cats will get that opportunity when they travel to Norman, Okla., for this weekend's three-game series.

The action begins at 7 p.m. Friday, with 2 p.m. games set for Saturday and Sunday.

K-State pitcher Matt Koeman held the Sooners to just one run in Tuesday night's 7-1 victory, giving up just two hits and striking out 11 batters.

"It was the best game that I've ever pitched," Koeman said.

K-State coach Mike Clark said he was impressed with Koeman's performance.

"Their only hits weren't very hard," he said.

"He pitched impressively against a good-hitting ballclub."

The K-State offense finally gave Koeman some runs in the bottom of the seventh, when a Scott Poepard double brought two Cats home.

Adam Green kept the K-State scoring drive alive when he tripled with the bases loaded. That was enough to secure the Cats' third Big Eight victory.

"We showed a lot of character," Clark said. "This was a good college baseball game."

The baseball got even better for K-State in Wednesday's action as the Cats overpowered OU, 14-9, improving their conference record to 4-6 and overall mark to 15-11.

K-State struck first, notching four runs in the bottom of the first inning.

OU answered with three runs of its own in the third, but the Cats scored three more times in the bottom of the inning to go up 7-3.

With the Cats leading 11-9 in the eighth, OU threatened to score when Rich Hills hit a long shot to center fielder Tim Decker.

Decker's catch saved the Cats' two-run advantage.

K-State went on to add three more insurance runs in the bottom of the eighth to preserve the victory.

Recording the win for K-State was Adam Novak, who improves to 3-0 on the year.

With the two wins against the Sooners, Decker said he hoped the Cats had proved something.

"We wanted to come out and show that if we play the kind of baseball we are capable of, we can play with anyone in the country."

Ryan McKee takes his helmet off in disgust after being called out during the Cats' doubleheader sweep of Doane College Thursday night at Frank Myers Field. K-State returns to action today against Oklahoma in Norman, Okla.

Tracksters ready for Texas Relays

WESS HUDELSON
Collegian

A tough road begins today for the K-State track team.

More than 3,600 athletes will be competing today at the Texas Relays in Austin, Texas.

Seventy-five university and junior-college teams have entered in addition to 21 invitational squads.

The women's university division features eight of last season's top-20 teams at the 1995 NCAA Indoor Championships, including national champ Louisiana State.

"The Texas Relays will be a very, very competitive meet," K-State track coach Cliff Rovelto said.

"In most events where there will be open competition, such as the short sprints, it could take a national-qualifying time to just make the finals."

Athletes had to meet qualifying standards in individual events just to enter the meet.

As a result, K-State will travel with only 16 members of the squad on hand.

The women's team will participate in the sprint medley and 1,600 meter relays at the meet.

All-Americans Belinda Hope and Nicole Green lead a potentially strong team in the 1,600 meter-relay.

Hope earned all-America status at the 1995 Indoor Championships with a fifth-place finish in the 400 meters.

Green was an all-American in the event last season both indoor and outdoor.

This season, Green has automatically qualified for the national championships in the 400 meters with a time of 52.6.

On Saturday, Green, Hope, Linda Shea and Karissa Owens will compete in the 1,600-meter relay.

"When you have two great legs that are as good as anyone, period, you obviously are halfway there," Rovelto said.

"Karissa (Owens), Irma (Betancourt) and Linda (Shea) are running well and are capable of running solid times. I think their potential to run fast times this weekend is great."

Gwen Wentland, Jill Montgomery and Wanita Dykstra will compete in the high jump.

Montgomery and Wentland will also compete in the long jump at the meet.

Kirsten and Kristen Schultz will battle for the javelin crown. Both are provisionally qualified for the NCAA Outdoor Championships in the event.

Owens, who is undefeated during the outdoor season thus far, will compete in the 100-meter dash.

Travis Livingston is riding a two-race win streak into the meet for the men in the 110-meter hurdles.

Livingston had a personal-best time of 14.17 seconds at the Southwest Invitational March 25. The provisional qualifying mark for the event stands at 14.04.

"I feel like I can reach the qualifying mark this weekend in Texas," Livingston said.

"I've run faster than that in my career before."

Big Eight Indoor Champion Ed Broxterman will compete in the high jump, and Steve Duren will compete in the long jump.

Aaron Larsen, who competed for the first time since undergoing elbow surgery last weekend in the KSU Open, will compete in the javelin with teammate T.J. Turner.

Cone traded to Toronto for 3 minor leaguers

ASSOCIATED PRESS

HAINES CITY, Fla. — Declaring that the future of baseball in Kansas City is at stake, the Royals traded Cy Young Award winner David Cone and his $5-million salary to the Toronto Blue Jays on Thursday for three minor leaguers.

"Our No. 1 goal is to keep baseball in Kansas City and keep it viable," said general manager Herk Robinson. "That's what we want to do the most."

The day before dealing their best pitcher, the Royals, who reportedly lost $25 million last season and were furious the strike ended without securing revenue-sharing for small-market clubs, unloaded their best outfielder.

Center fielder Brian McRae went to the Chicago Cubs for two prospects.

The two trades, plus a few lesser moves, have trimmed a $40-million payroll to "the $30-million neighborhood," Robinson said, indicating the fire sale of top players had ended.

"When we say we're doing what's best for the Kansas City Royals, I mean that literally," he said.

Does that mean the team's survival in Kansas City?

"Yes."

Cone, a union activist throughout the long strike, was not bitter.

"It's no secret I've got one year on my contract, and there's no guarantee I would be with the Royals next year," he said.

"I'm still going to be a Royals fan. I'm still going to do a lot of good things in that community. But if you can't play for your hometown, then Toronto's a great place to be. It's a class organization just like the Royals."

The Royals readily admit they've weakened the club in the short run.

"Sometimes you have to bite some real tough bullets," said first-year manager Bob Boone.

"You can't hide the fact that taking a Cy Young winner out of your rotation is a blow to the quality of your rotation.

"But nobody said it was going to be easy. I'm not going to cry in my beer and say 'poor me.' What we're looking at is the long-term health of this organization."

Since the death in 1993 of team founder Ewing Kauffman, the Royals have been operated by a board of directors with CEO David Glass waiting to purchase the club once the game's finances were rearranged to ensure the viability of small-market clubs. Kauffman, a billionaire, set aside a percentage of his fortune to shore up expected losses until a buyer was found to keep the club in Kansas City.

"You've heard of the unlimited expense account that people exceed," Robinson said. "I think it's safe to say that Mr. Kauffman did not leave an unlimited amount."

The Royals got three minor-league prospects for Cone: infielders Chris Stynes and Tony Medrano and relief pitcher David Sinnes.

Robinson said Cone's union activities had nothing to do with the trade.

"We got three players in return we think can be very, very good players in future," Robinson said.

"No. 2, it is a substantial reduction in our payroll for 1995. And No. 3, there was a great deal of uncertainty about our ability to sign him at the end of the year."

Cone, a Kansas City native and one of the team's most popular players, was 16-5 with a 2.94 ERA in the strike-shortened 1994 season and has a 111-70 career record with a 3.12 ERA.

"It's a sad day," Cone said.

"But I understand it from the Royals' standpoint. They're doing what they have to do, and I hope it works out. I've had nothing but good experiences with this organization."

Colorado to battle Cats during weekend match

BRIAN THOMAS
Collegian

The K-State tennis team is looking to stop a two-match Big Eight Conference losing streak this weekend.

After dropping a pair of matches to Oklahoma State, 8-1, and Oklahoma, 6-3, the Wildcats might seem to have a confidence problem going into Saturday's home match with Colorado.

That is not the case.

The Cats, now 7-8 overall and 1-2 in conference play, welcome a Buffalo team carrying the No. 41 ranking in the country.

K-State tennis coach Steve Bietau said he likes his team's chances against Colorado.

"I think we let Oklahoma State slip away last Sunday when they were really beatable," Bietau said.

"We then played better against just a very tough Oklahoma team. We feel Colorado is a team we can compete with very well, and they would be a good win for us."

The Wildcats' top-ranked player, Karina Kuregian, looks to extend her nine-match win streak this weekend.

Kuregian, who leaped 13 spots in the recent Rolex Collegiate rankings to No. 13, hopes to improve on her 23-5 singles record.

After seeing their 10-match win streak stopped against Oklahoma State, the doubles team of Kuregian and Martine Shrubsole wants to push their new string of victories to two.

Kuregian and Shrubsole, 15-2 in doubles play, saw their national ranking rise from No. 17 to a tie for the No. 14 position in the poll.

The No. 38 ranked doubles team of Karen McIntosh and Nathalie Dickson led the Buffaloes into this conference match-up.

Bietau said Colorado will be a great challenge for the Cats.

"Colorado is another deep team," Bietau said.

"I picked them fourth or fifth in the coaches poll. I like playing them here rather than in Boulder.

"They are a scrappy team. They have to deal with the altitude in Colorado. They are much like the OU team we just faced. They are not very strong at the top but balanced throughout."

The Wildcats get their chance against the nationally ranked Buffaloes at 10 a.m. Saturday.

"We feel Colorado is a team we can compete with very well, and they would be a very good win for us."

Youch! Naughty kids dismember Big Boy

TOLEDO, Ohio — The grisly murder of Big Boy was tough to swallow. Now it's time for justice to be served.

Police say a plethora of pompous men, most of them college students, admitted Tuesday they pilfered the pudgy, pompadoured 300-pound plastic pitchman from the perimeter of a public restaurant, dismembered him with a hacksaw and dumped his remains at other Big Boy restaurants with notes that declared: "Big Boy is Dead."

(It was only eight men, but I just couldn't stop hitting the 'p' keystroke.)

"The long saga is over," said Dave Nelson, manager of the restaurant from which the 6-foot fiberglass statue was taken on March 17. "We know who killed Big Boy. We can all rest a little bit easier."

I know it kept me up at nights knowing that if Big Boy wasn't safe, then how dare I consider myself safe.

His one fear: "I hope it doesn't inspire other Big Boy killers. I don't think we can handle another one."

The hamburger-toting statue with the black pompadour, red-and-white checkered pants and suspenders has guarded the doors of Big Boy restaurants since the 1930s.

Big Boy's abductors took the statue to an apartment on March 17 and debated what to do with it until one suggested they "chop him up."

"One thing led to another, and the kids started dismembering him," Scanlon said. "They took the head and cut it off. Somebody else took an arm, a leg."

The youths were overheard as saying they have always hated Big Boy for various reasons.

Martinez, 18, said he knew stealing Big Boy was "a pretty stupid thing to do." But, he quickly added, "It was a lot of fun."

Big Girl, a little-known sister chain of the Big Boy restaurants, has sworn she will have the eight men's heads on a platter and served with fries before this whole thing is over.

Smoking hazardous to janitors' health

CERES, Calif. — Three janitors trying to freeze a gopher to death caused an explosion that injured 19 people, most of them students, at an elementary school, officials said.

The Fowler Elementary School janitors were blown out of a utility room last Monday when one of them tried to light a cigarette after spraying the rodent with a freezing solvent used to clean gum and wax off floors.

The gopher survived, and was later released in a field.

People representing competitive solvent companies have starting asking the gopher to appear in their advertisements claiming how ineffective this particular solvent is. Hollywood types have already tried to get the gopher to tell its story, but the gopher is holding out for its own talk show.

Jeff Davis said he and the other janitors were trying to euthanize the animal, which a student had found on school grounds and brought to them.

The men were inside a small, poorly ventilated utility room with the doors closed when they sprayed several cans of the gum remover on the gopher, said police Sgt. Hollie Hall. (Isn't that what it says to do on the instructions on the solvent can?)

Then one of them tried to light a cigarette, causing the explosion. I guess he skipped that day in school when they taught us all that gophers, gum remover and cigarettes just don't mix.

Vote Smatterer X; I'll spare your life

Tihsllub Folluf and I, Smatterer X, have been hitting the campaign trail pretty hard this week. Tihsllub and I have met some opposition during our journeys around campus.

"But Smatterer X, we don't like the concepts of anarchy and survival of the fittest," are the constant retorts Tihsllub and I have had to endure.

We need strength in our student leadership. If student leaders can't handle 16-hour work days and mandatory leadership boot camp, then have them step aside for leaders who can. We will build a great dynasty out of K-State upon the bones and ashes of those who oppose us.

Tihsllub and I are prepared to take student government to new levels. We will find dirt on every legislator in Topeka to manipulate them into doing our bidding.

No one is safe. We will make everyone work harder and longer hours for K-State's benefit.

Just like our slogan says, "Vote for us because we know where you live."

¡Viva la revolución!

Businesses past and future meet in The 'Ville story by Mike Hill

photos by Darren Whitley

In 1889, Aggieville began with one business. One-hundred and six years later, the district is home to 120 bars, shops and restaurants.

Cheryl Sieben, director of the Aggieville Business Association, said Aggieville is the place to start a new business.

"Aggieville is the place where the small-business person can open that new business," she said.

Hanson, a student of the Kansas State Agricultural College, constructed the first business in Aggieville, which had a barber shop in the front and sold pens, pencils and secondhand textbooks in the back.

He was the first of many to start a business in Aggieville, not knowing if he would succeed or fail but hoping for the best.

In 1908, the Student Co-operative made Aggieville history by constructing the first brick building on the intersection of Moro Street and Manhattan Avenue.

Dan Walter, Varney's Book Store textbook manager and Aggieville historian, said this was the first building to get Aggieville started.

"Probably the real development of Aggieville took place between 1900 and 1915," he said.

Walter said the first stores in Aggieville were mostly grocery stores that catered to the students, but some of the stores still sell the same things they did back then.

"The Varney's Book Store was built in 1916, and the Miller Theater, now the Campus Theater, was built in 1926," he said.

Through the years, family businesses have been established and handed down from generation to generation.

"Olson Shoe Repair dates back to his grandfather," Walter said.

Other businesses have left Aggieville, only to be brought back by children or grandchildren of their founders.

John's Creamery was established in 1913 in what is now the Varsity Theater. Now 82 years later, Joe John, the grandson of the founder, is bringing John's Creamery back to Aggieville.

"Barring a major catastrophe, we should open on Monday," John said.

John said they will sell homemade ice cream that they make in a building east of town on U.S. Highway 24.

"A lot of the recipes are from my father, grandfather and uncle," he said.

The ice-cream store will have what John calls a slab, which will enable him to make almost any flavor.

"We will have different, things like cheesecake and amaretto, that will be plain, and then we can put strawberries or anything else the customer wants on top of it," he said.

John had previously owned John's Ice Cream and Video in Westloop.

"We feel this move will make us more convenient for the college students," he said.

He said he wanted to come back because of the tradition his family had in Aggieville.

"In 1918, my grandfather built the Kite's building and moved his ice-cream and candy business there, and my father was born in the upstairs apartments," John said.

Aggieville is also known as a shopping area where businesses can try to succeed.

Amy's Healthy Discount is a natural food store trying to get started.

Amy Springer, owner, said she was originally from Manhattan but had moved to California for about 15 years. While she lived there, she used only natural foods.

"When I came back to Manhattan, there wasn't a store that had all of the things that I used," Springer said.

She said she created the store for herself as well as for the younger people in the area.

"I think younger people are very interested in natural foods," she said.

Aggieville seemed the perfect place to set up her new store, Springer said.

"Aggieville has a more unique specialized shopping environment compared to the rest of Manhattan," she said.

She said being in Aggieville should make her more visible to the college students.

"The younger people are quicker to know the new businesses in town, especially when they are in Aggieville," she said.

Trey Rutledge, senior in landscape and turf management, said as a vegetarian, he appreciates the organic foods.

"The organic beef and poultry is a great thing," he said.

Rutledge said a natural food store in Manhattan is long overdue.

"It's about time we get a store like this. I'm sure the response will be overwhelming," he said.

Another new business trying to get started in Aggieville is a Korean/Chinese restaurant called Chop Sticks.

Hea Markham, owner, said even though Chop Sticks looks like a fast-food place, it is really a restaurant.

"We have everything a restaurant has except a waitress," she said.

Markham said since it opened, her customers are not who she had expected.

"We thought students would be our major customers, but it has turned out to be Manhattan residents," she said.

Time is one thing that is essential to making good, healthy food, Markham said.

"It takes a little bit of time to do it right," she said.

Jared Riedl, sophomore in architectural engineering, said it may be short-lived.

"It's good food, but I don't think they can compete against Hunam's," he said.

Aggieville has a long tradition of businesses coming and going. Almost every building in Aggieville has housed a different business than it does today.

One of the biggest moves in recent history is about to take place. Lowman's is moving to the vacant Kite's building.

Owner Bill Lowman said moving would allow the clothing store to expand.

"We felt the move afforded us a greater opportunity to expand and improve upon what we do at Lowman's, and what a better place in Aggieville than the historic Kite's corner," he said.

Lowman said the move would take place later this month.

"We are currently finishing a few of the Bill Lowman, owner of Lowman's clothing store, and his 5-year-old son, Ben, sweep in front of their Aggieville store. Lowman said his business is preparing to move where Kite's used to be.

A client of the Java Hut enters the new Aggieville business, which attracts young and old alike. New businesses often breathe new life into aging buildings by remodeling them. The Java Hut remodeled its building, which had previously been Aggie Bike Station.

Play centers on woman's mind

Despite mental state, character grasps for memory

NOLAN SCHRAMM
Collegian

The two people begin arguing. The woman, Jan, is dressed in a leather biker jacket. She yells at Nick, her brother.

Nick, a man dressed in brown tweed pants and coat, holds a glass containing some intoxicant. He yells back at Jan, telling her to fuck off.

Stacey, the picture of innocence, steps in to tell them to stop. Jan and Nick both turn to Stacey and yell expletives at her, saying she doesn't have a clue as to what is going on.

A voice floats overhead. It is the voice of Sarah, announcing her diary entry. The other characters do not notice the voice.

"Empty Pages," an original play by Chuck Bland, is the story of a woman named Sarah who is living in a catatonic state.

In her coma-like state of shock, she fights a mental battle to remember elements of her childhood that are blocked from her consciousness.

Her older brother and sister, Nick and Jan, are represented in two forms.

Their older selves are played by Toby Denning and Jerri Gillean.

Their childhood selves, on stage simultaneously, are played by Eric Ancker and Jamie Miller.

They respond to each other but are never openly acknowledged by their older counterparts in the early stage of the play.

The younger siblings often urge their older selves to follow courses of action.

Each young one is more outspoken, more loving than its older self.

The story begins with Sarah calling a meeting with her siblings, who are now adults in their late twenties.

PLAY INFO

Empty Pages will be playing at 8 tonight and Saturday in the Purple Masque Theatre. Ticket are $2.

Nick and Jan are extremely bitter toward one another, often exploding into insults and becoming defensive.

Their younger counterparts, representing elements of their childhood, are more cooperative with each other, urging them to talk immediately, to get the secret of their terrible past out in the open and to acknowledge their underlying true feelings of love toward one another.

Sarah appears, trying to talk to them, but no one can hear her.

It is merely a representation of Sarah's inner mind.

While Nick and Jan end up in a shouting match in front of Sarah, Stacey, another sister, comes into the scene.

She has no skeletons in her closet and no character representing her childhood.

She is easily offended by the harsh language around her and breaks down into tears.

The meeting falls apart, each character storming out the door.

Sarah is being counseled by a psychoanalyst, who is trying to get her to acknowledge her hidden memories of a dark childhood.

Because Sarah is still in the catatonic state, she can only respond by playing out the doctor's advice in her mind.

Even the most casual observer is irreversibly drawn into the main character's journey to the center of her fears and her challenge to confront her past so that she may resolve her future.

The lighting by Dylan Zehr was truly remarkable. It cast colors to set the various moods — blue identified gloominess; yellows showed memories from the past.

White focused the audience on the present and the heated arguments.

And darkness was the mood that needed no explanation.

Tim Aumiller's directing ensured the acting was well-meshed into a cohesive production, and one could see that many hours of red-light, green-light had gone into this one.

Sound, courtesy of Aumiller and Jennifer Collins, also drew the audience into the story, and music and voice overdubs cast an eerie feel over the audience.

Bland's fascination with memory inspired him to write this play.

The questions persist: What is it we remember? How much control do we have over the past? Do we tend to remember the good or the terrible?

Empty pages will be shown at 8 p.m. today and Saturday.

If you truly want to experience the essence of theater, the ups and the horrible downs of drama, and the exploration of human consciousness, go see it.

UPC acoustic guitarist livens Union Station

Students studying in K-State Union Station on Thursday night listened to the tunes of Dave Zerfas, a Manhattan resident also known as Zerf, who plays the acoustic guitar.

Zerf played as part of Union Program Council's Eclectic Entertainment.

Holly Bane, a past chair of UPC's Eclectic Entertainment Committee, said the reason UPC wanted to bring in Zerf was because it wanted something different besides just bands.

Bane said although she had never heard Zerf perform, she knew he had put on good performances in the past.

"He's played as courtyard entertainment and went over really well," she said.

Zerf played a wide range of music varying from Kansas pioneer tunes to the Byrds.

Although not all of the students who listened to Zerf said they could identify with him, they seemed to agree his music was interesting.

Craig Huhman, senior in business, said he wasn't accustomed to Zerf's style.

"All of his songs sound the same," he said. "He sounds a little

▶ MOVIE REVIEW

Foreign film is pee-your-pants funny escape

RUSSELL FORTMEYER
Collegian

The state of American comedies is in turmoil.

Witness the last two truly hilarious comedies, "Four Weddings and a Funeral" and the new "Muriel's Wedding." They are both foreign films, English and Australian respectively.

"Muriel's Wedding" is not just plain funny. It's giggle uncontrollably, pee-your-pants funny — the type of movie where you sit back, forget pressing issues and enjoy yourself.

Muriel's Wedding
Ratings:
★★★★ Must see
★★★ Worth a peek
★★ Good future rental
★ Bastardization of cinema

Hollywood's idea of a comedy is a movie featuring a really big celebrity in some wacky situation ("Junior"). They play like TV sitcoms — the one-joke wonder.

"Muriel's Wedding" is about a homely, slightly overweight girl, Muriel (Toni Collette), who longs for a wedding, not necessarily the husband, but the wedding. Her friends are a group of rich bitches who put her down and don't include her.

Muriel's parents are complete losers. Her dad's the local crooked politician, and her mom is lost on some distant planet. Her siblings — drunken, Aussie stereotypes — aren't much to look at, either.

So, Muriel's life consists of daydreaming about wedding dresses and getting married. In her spare time (since she doesn't work, she has a lot of it), Muriel sits in her room listening to ABBA, specifically the sweetie-pie, dreamy song, "Dancing Queen."

Writer/director P.J. Hogan uses ABBA's greatest hits throughout the entire movie, adding a candy-coating of sweetness and hilarity. It's Hogan's first film, giving it an innocence and realness rarely felt in big-budget Hollywood laugh-fests.

A lot of the sweetness of "Muriel's Wedding" comes from Toni Collette. Her simple-hearted performance and toothy grin endear themselves to you. Hell, by the end of the movie, I wanted to marry her. The funny thing is, Collette looks nothing like Muriel, having gained 40 pounds for the role (how she lost it is anyone's guess).

If you, too, are delighted by Muriel's taste in music, check out ABBA's new greatest hits album, "ABBA Gold."

You'll get 19 of the late '70s and early '80s greatest disco-inspired hits. Well, I wouldn't call it complete disco, but more of a love child between Donna Summer and Karen Carpenter.

ABBA hails from Sweden. Its members — Agnetha Faltskog, Bjorn Ulvaeus, Benny Andersson and Anni-Frid "Frida" Lyngstad (hence, ABBA) — rose to prominence in the late '70s and early '80s. The group disappointingly split up because of marital problems (Agnetha and Bjorn were a couple, as too were Benny and Anni-Frid).

One of their final songs together was the bittersweet "The Winner Takes It All," a befitting end to a group of extremely listenable musicians.

Satisfaction may be just an order away

Dear Cassie,
I want to buy lots of sex toys. However, I am too shy to go into a store where sex toys are sold.

Please get me some addresses or something that tells me where I can get some catalogs (preferably free catalogs).

Signed, Shy Horny Person

Dear Shy,
You are the kind of perv that gives my columns a bad name.

Although I never prescribe to such devices myself, and do not, in any way, shape or form, advocate the use or spreading of pornographic material, I doubt very seriously the K-State Information Center will answer this, so I will.

I have it on the best of authority if you buy certain magazines like Playboy, you will find what you are looking for in the back of them.

Candidates debate parking

how many people read the Collegian?" Scott Phillips, presidential candidate, said.

Liz Ring, presidential candidate, said the fee system is unrealistic. Ring said she talked to the director of Lafene, Lannie Zweimiller, who said it would hurt budgeting because the center would not be able to know how much money to expect.

Peterson said he also talked to Zweimiller, but he came away with the opinion that it would be possible to implement a user-fee system.

Brad Finkeldei, Peterson's running mate, said the user-fee system was in place in other places, including the University of Nebraska.

All of the candidates supported restructuring the P.E. requirement expect Jeremy Blair, presidential candidate, who wanted simply to eliminate it.

By restructuring it, other classes such as aerobics would cover the requirement. Military activity was also viewed as way to get this credit.

All supported having no fee for bicycle registration.

Phillips said he hoped to declassify all the parking spaces, except handicapped places. He said there should be no such thing as faculty passes. He also said he was against any parking garage.

All the candidates hoped to expand campus safety through expanding the escort service off campus.

Ring and Andrew Tomb, presidential candidate, both suggested walking patrols on campus.

Blair said a beeper device could be sold to students. This device could be activated by a person in trouble, and K-State Police could find this person in 30 seconds.

Peterson said he wanted to reduce the classified parking places from 400 to 200.

Patrick Carney, vice presidential candidate, said this was the second debate that all the candidates had attended. The other forum was Wednesday in K-State Union Forum Hall.

Carney said the forum Wednesday was poorly attended.

Bliss said Thursday's forum had about 40 to 45 people, about half of whom were part of campaign staffs.

"Unfortunately, only supporters are coming to debates," Tomb said.

"I would like to see people make informed opinions, and I don't understand how they are going to do it," Tomb said.

Playing independent no problem for Zerf odd, but maybe it's because I'm just not used to his style. "

"He's just interesting," Huhman said.

Zerfas said he was glad to be a part of the eclectic entertainment because he enjoys playing for a college crowd.

In fact, Zerfas said one of his sub-goals was to be able to play in some coffee shops. But he said since the birth of his child, he hasn't had time to play very much.

"This is the first show I've had since February," he said.

Zerfas said he used to play in several bands but has enjoyed playing on his own because it gives him independence to play what he wants, when he wants.

"My criteria for doing anything is that I have to really like it. But I have to be conscience not to alienate my audience," he said.

"My goal is to present songs in an honest approach. It's no-frills," Zerfas said.

Noah Mosier, freshman in psychology, said he really liked Zerf.

"He's got the rock 'n' roll spirit," he said.

Aggieville still a special place for hopeful new business owners final details and look forward to moving the latter part of April," he said.

With the new space, he said he would be able to add some new clothing lines to the existing ones.

"There are quite a few new lines that we are very excited about, but at the same time, we still want to continue on with Polo and Nautica," Lowman said.

He said many of the Aggieville businesses have been stepping forward in an effort to restore the original look of Aggieville, and he is planning on doing the same with the Kite's building.

"Recently, many people have stepped forward to open new businesses or renovate old ones, all showing their belief in the strength of this area," he said.

Jason Otke, senior in construction science, said having a business in that building other than Kite's will be different.

"It will be weird going into the Kite's building and not having a beer," he said.

Drew Green, sophomore in biology, said it was nice to see Lowman's moving into the building.

"It will be good for an established business such as Lowman's to move into the larger building so a smaller new business can take their place in their old building," he said.

Even 106 years later, Aggieville is still a special place for the hopeful small business owner, Walter said.

"For a lot of people, it is a dream come true," he said.

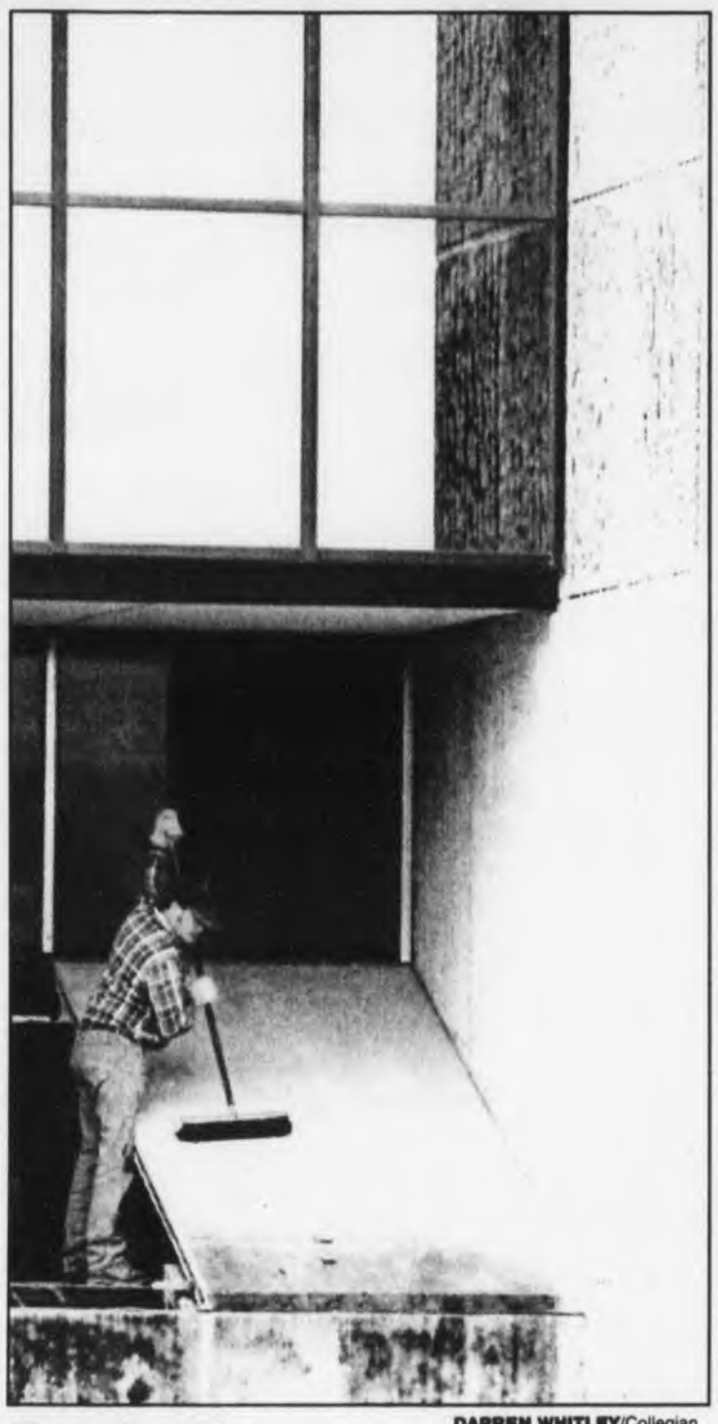
TIPS FOR WRITING A CLASSIFIED AD

Always put what item or service you are advertising first. This helps potential buyers find what they are looking for.



Don't use abbreviations. Many buyers are confused by abbreviations.

Consider including the price. This tells buyers if they are looking at something in their price range.

CATEGORIES

To help you find what you are looking for, the classified ads have been arranged by category and sub-category. All categories are marked by one of the large images, and sub-categories are preceded by a number designation.

WE DO NOT USE PHONE NUMBERS OR LAST NAMES IN PERSONALS.

Brush off

Bob Smith of Manhattan brushes off a limestone window sill on Durland Hall Thursday afternoon. Smith, who works for R.M. Baril Construction, was preparing the 3,000-pound stone for removal so the steel framework that supports it can be repaired. The window sill stones were noticed to be sliding away from the building by a smoker who took a break on one of the west balconies, Superintendent Vyrle Webb said. Durland Hall was built in 1974.

Tribunal recommends better minutes

by Kromm for senators to view.

Wheeler said he did not know the magazine was in the room.

"To recommend the chair should remove information within the chamber is a bad precedent to set. It is an open meeting, and people are allowed to bring anything in," Wheeler said.

Tribunal also recommended a need for more accurate and complete minutes of Student Senate meetings.

"It was impossible to determine what exactly transpired on the March 2, 1995, meeting," Wesolowsky said.

Wheeler said he agreed with the recommendation that more detailed minutes are needed.

"It is also a good idea to tape Senate meetings," he said.

A third recommendation by Tribunal is that Senate should read regulations that are called out of order before a roll-call vote is taken.

"The basic reason for this is just in case anything is called out of order, which means that action was inappropriate, we don't want the senators' decision to be based on that action," Wesolowsky said.

Tribunal questioned whether the regulations violated by the two senators were repeated before a vote was taken.

A final recommendation to Senate was that only the Allocations Committee should view the actual items pertaining to any funding request.

"This just helps Student Senate from getting into trouble. Student Senate is not supposed to look at any content anyway. The Allocations Committee is supposed to be reviewing everything," Wesolowsky said.

Wheeler said the Tribunal recommendations would be talked over with the Senate executive committee. He said Senate will make a decision whether to appeal the decision within 48 hours.

"The decision worked out as well as it could be expected. I hope it will prevent future problems like this. I thought it was very good," Kromm said.

Metazine will still be funded through the Fine Arts Council. Kromm said if all goes well, the magazine will be available next week in the K-State Union.

"On the first 1,000 or so magazines, all the lettering on the cover will be done by hand. Each one will be numbered. Every person can have a collector's item," Kromm said.

Student Senate has three days to appeal ruling

Senate and Metazine with a written ruling tomorrow. Senate will then have three class days to appeal the ruling, Wheeler said.

The appeal will be heard by a judicial board made of a representative of the dean of student life's office and two students, said Tricia Nolfi, coordinator of student activities.

However, several senators were against the appeal.

Dan Lewerenz, arts and sciences senator, said Senate should wait for the written ruling of Tribunal before making a decision.

"It still baffles me that a deliberative body would respond to something that was not concrete," Lewerenz said.

Phil Anderson, faculty representative, said there was no need to get into a legislative fight over a decision that was not binding.

"Take the criticism," Anderson said. "We will consider it and do with it what we will."

Senate voted 39-8 to appeal the decision.

Wesolowsky said Tribunal members support the Tribunal's decision.

"My board stands by our decision, and you can appeal it if you would like." Wesolowsky said.

The clause that Senate was found guilty of violating will not be in the rules next year.

The clause in the funding regulations prohibiting consideration based on political views was taken out of the guidelines several weeks ago.

"Under our new allocation, this wouldn't happen," Chuck Haynes, business senator, said.

Week educates about Jesus

pus, Ericson said.

"Many of us go to different Christian groups and go to different churches, and sometimes, we feel like we're the only ones out there," she said. "This is a chance for all the Christians to get together on campus and celebrate Jesus Christ together."

Another purpose for the week is education, Jesse Prater, sophomore in elementary education, said.

"A lot of people don't understand the truth about Jesus and the idea behind his teachings," he said.

Steanson said the week will offer information about Jesus in a way people can understand.

"Both Christians and non-Christians want to hear about Jesus presented in a way they can understand," she said. "And during the week, we will offer that."

She also said she thinks a lot of people don't understand what the term Christianity means because there is a lack of morality in people's lives.

"One of our goals is to make people more aware of their morality and to get people thinking," Steanson said.

Ericson said the most important thing about the week is the recognition of Jesus.

"More than anything, we want to see Jesus being lifted up on our campus," Ericson said.

Steanson said she expects a lot of people to participate in the week.

"It's hard to tell how many people will participate, because people will participate in a lot of different ways. They will participate either by prayer, behind the scenes, or it can be as much as thinking about Jesus Christ," she said.

Party wants monthly reports

He said members of the party hope to keep fiscal responsibility in mind daily when dealing with Student Publications Inc. business and operations.

Active involvement with the new Student Publications Finance Committee would allow Students for Students to take a more active role in the budgeting process, he said.

Bliss said he was looking forward to allowing students more participation in the budget process. Monthly fiscal reports will also be reviewed by the board, he said.

The final point of their platform deals with the upcoming review of the Student Publications General Operating Fee.

"I think most importantly, we have to communicate what the fee does," Clouse said.

It is not only important to educate student senators but their constituents as well, he said.

"Most students don't know how much they pay for Student Publications or how that money is spent," Clouse said.

Bliss said the monthly fiscal reports will help the board lobby for whatever changes will need to be made in the Student Publications Fee. All five candidates signed copies of their Commitment to Progress, which outlines the goals of the party platform.

Van Zile Hall wins annual celebration

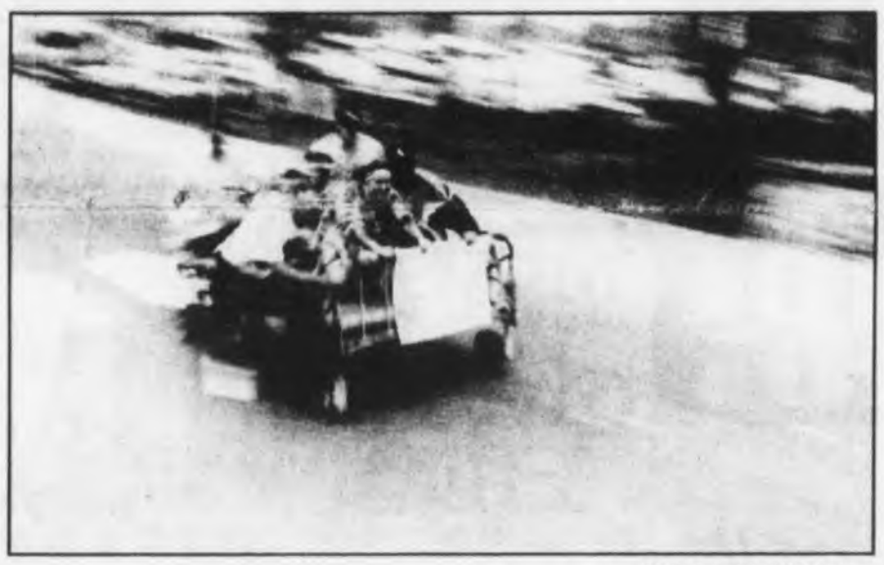
Although Sunday didn't feel like spring, Spring Fling was hot this weekend.

The Spring Fling activities, which began Friday night in Union Station, ended Sunday with Van Zile Hall as the overall winner.

Moore and Goodnow halls were second and third respectively in the competition, which was sponsored by the Kansas State University Association of Residence Halls.



The overall winners were determined by their finishings and participation in the various events.

But the amount of planning and help that the halls contributed to Spring Fling prior to the competitions were also considered in the points awarded for overall winners, said Julia Trowbridge, sophomore in architectural engineering and chairperson for Spring Fling.

Smurthwaite House won first in Family Feud, followed by West Hall. Goodnow took first in the Roommate game, followed by a tie between Haymaker and Moore halls.

In the Roommate game, which was structured like "The Newlywed Game" on television, 10 teams competed to

▶ KANSAS LEGISLATURE

Lottery's future still undecided

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — House opponents of a bill granting the lottery six more years of life say they aren't standing in its way.

The Senate approved a version of the bill that made the lottery a permanent state agency, 29-8. But the House has rejected two versions of the bill that would have extended the life of the lottery — one indefinitely and the other for six years.

Gov. Bill Graves has been pressuring the Legislature to pass a lottery-extension bill, saying the state can't afford to give up its $48-million annual income.

But nothing happened on it as the Legislature took first adjournment Friday night. It is certain to be an issue when legislators return April 26 for their wrapup session.

Asked at an impromptu news conference late Friday night whether failure of the Legislature to enact a bill reducing motor-vehicle taxes endangered the lottery, Graves replied:

"I don't think so."

The governor said he didn't think the lottery was being held hostage to gain leverage for passing a car-tax reduction bill.

"All this means is that in the last three days (of the wrapup session) we'll still be trying to unravel car taxes," Graves said. "But if we don't have the lottery revenue, it makes it that much harder to do anything on car taxes."

Graves said he believes the bigger issue delaying extension of the lottery is the effort to tie it to approval of slot machines at the state's three parimutuel racetracks.

"I still believe the people who want slots at racetracks are going to hold out for an up-or-down vote on that issue," he said. "If they are successful, I'll support that. But we're running out of time. They probably have only one more chance (to get a vote on slot machines)."

However, Rep. David Adkins, R-Leawood, a lottery supporter, said he thinks both issues are holding the lottery bill down: slot machines at racetracks and a reduction in car taxes.

The House and Senate have repeatedly rejected each other's proposals to reduce car taxes. In retaliation, Adkins said, many House members have voted against proposals to extend the lottery.

Provisions allowing slot machines at racetracks were successfully added to the bill in the House Federal and State Affairs Committee. The House rejected the combination by a vote of 58-65.

Without legislative action to extend it, the lottery will be abolished July 1, 1996.

Diversity celebrated with event

STEPHANIE STEENBOCK

Adults and children alike gathered Saturday for Cultural Nite '95 to celebrate diversity and to bring International Week to a close.

Food from Vietnam, China, Indonesia, Bangladesh, Japan and Thailand was served, providing guests and performers a real taste of the world.

"The food was great. I ate most of it, and I thought that the best was the Korean and Indonesian dishes," Suryadi Oentoeng, senior in engineering, said.

The program gave the audience a look at the many cultures represented at K-State through song, dance and ceremonies.

The journey through cultures began with a look at Mexico.

Students in the Spanish II class taught by Maria Beck, graduate teaching assistant in modern languages, performed a dance called "Los Machetes," or dance of the knives.

Beck chose to teach her students Mexican dance as a cultural activity for the class.

She also performed the Spanish version of the hit song "Hero" by Mariah Carey.

"I chose this song because it says what I want for my students both now and in the future," Beck said.

Ming-tie Huang, graduate student in physics, played a Taiwanese instrument called the pi-pa.

K-State's Earth Day celebrations wouldn't fit into just one week.

That's why the organizers of the events decided to run events during a two-week period, said Pat Carney, chairman of the Union Program Council Issues and Ideas Committee.

"We felt it would probably be better to make it two weeks instead of trying to cram everything into one week," Carney said.

Robert Wilson, president of Students for Sustainability, said the events would be highlighted by Gaylord Nelson, the founder of Earth Day, who will be speaking on April 18.

"All of the events are good. There are some potentially smaller events than others," Wilson said.

Wilson said the theme set by the national Earth Day committee was "The Time Has Come."

"Now the time has really come to make firm commitments, both globally and nationally and locally," Wilson said.

Wilson said he thought the series of events organized to celebrate Earth Day's 25th

▶ BODY OF MAN MISSING FROM WAMEGO MAY HAVE BEEN FOUND IN RIVER

The search for a Wamego resident might be over.

Riley County Police investigators found a body in the Kansas River Friday.

The body of a black male, who was about 30 years old, was found in the river, Riley County Police Sgt. D.W. Howser said. This fits the description of Aaron Williams, a Wamego man who disappeared over a week ago.

The body was found by people hunting for mushrooms about one-fourth of a mile downstream from where crews were searching for Williams, Howser said.

No positive identification of the body has yet been made. An autopsy was performed Saturday, but the results are not yet available.

Williams' was reported missing March 29. His car was found abandoned off Collins Lane near Hunters Island.

▶ BILL MIGHT ALLOW TUITION INCREASES

TOPEKA (AP) — Community colleges in Kansas would be able to raise tuition under a bill approved by the Legislature.

The bill was approved Friday and sent to Gov. Bill Graves.

State law currently prohibits the state's 19 community colleges from charging more than $27 per credit hour.

The bill was managed in the House by Rep. Bob Tomlinson of Roeland Park. Tuition rates became an issue when trustees of Johnson County Community College failed in efforts to pass a $72-million bond issue for expansion.

Tomlinson said tuition pays about 15 percent of the cost of educating a community college student. Tuition at state universities pays for about 25 percent of their costs.

▶ AVERAGE GASOLINE PRICES ON THE RISE

LOS ANGELES (AP) — Motorists nationwide paid an average of 1-1/2 cents more per gallon of gasoline in the past two weeks, the Lundberg Survey reported Sunday.

The average price, including all grades and levels of service, was 118.98 cents a gallon in Friday's survey, up 1.55 cents from the March 24 survey.

Oil industry analyst Trilby Lundberg said the April 7 survey of gas stations nationwide showed the first significant overall increase in the price of gasoline since October.

Average prices by grade and service were as follows:

Self-serve: regular unleaded 112.32 cents a gallon; mid-grade unleaded 122.76 cents; premium unleaded 131.17 cents; regular leaded 116.59 cents.

▶ DEFENSE SECRETARY BREAKS SILENCE

NEW YORK (AP) — As defense secretary for two presidents, one of John F. Kennedy's best and brightest, Robert McNamara helped draw the United States deeply into the Vietnam War.

Now he admits, "We were terribly wrong."

With the upcoming release of his memoirs, McNamara is breaking his quarter-century public silence on the war that left 58,000 Americans dead and bitterly divided the country. It was a conflict, he notes ruefully, that some called McNamara's War.

The memoirs of other officials, along with declassified documents and other reports, have described how dissension grew in the Johnson White House over Vietnam policy as the war worsened.

▶ ESCAPED RED PANDA CUB FOUND NEAR STAGG HILL, RETURNED TO ZOO

The red panda cub that escaped from Sunset Zoological Park Thursday night is now safe at home.

Don Wixom, zoo director, said the red panda, Nepal, is in holding and doing fine.

The red panda was found in the Stagg Hill area of Manhattan, more than two miles away from Sunset Zoo.

"It just blows me away that he would go that far," Wixom said.

Fayez Husseini, associate professor of interior architecture, discovered his house guest early Friday morning.

He found the red panda trying to get a drink on his back porch. He had not heard about the red panda's escape.

"I asked him, 'What the heck are you?' It was a strange-looking creature," Husseini said.

He called his neighbor and described what he saw.

"I said it had a really cute face and a long, bushy red tail. She said 'Well, Fayez, it could be a squirrel.' It wasn't."

Husseini said when he returned to his yard, the red panda had been scared into a tree by a cat.

After failing to identify the red panda in a book of North American mammals, Husseini called Sunset Zoo.

"They said they had a team ready to go. They said they'd be here in two minutes," Husseini said. "A whole bunch of cars and Jeeps pulled up exactly two minutes later — at least 15 people got out."

It took the team 35 to 40 minutes to get the red panda out of the tree.

"He tried to leap from one tree to another," Wixom said. "He didn't quite make it, but the branches helped him down."

Zoo officials netted the red panda at the bottom of the tree and are holding him to give veterinary examinations. He will be returned to his repaired cage soon, Wixom said.

"It's getting close to the time when he'd be striking out on his own in the wild," Wixom said.

"He's just been a Mr. Adventurous," he said.

Art has construction theme

CARY CONOVER

It's not often Durland Hall is turned into an exhibit of art.

But that's exactly what it was Saturday night.

Myron and Donna Rooks, co-chairpersons of the Friends of the Library Gala, were in charge of the art this year.

The construction theme brought a lighthearted mood to the evening. The contributions of Diane Dollar, assistant professor of art, included statues of humorous people looking down into the atrium from the second and third floors.

The Rooks' daughter, Ronna Tyson, art instructor at Manhattan High School, said her mother started working on the projects for the evening more than two months ago.

Rooks created the statues on the main floor of the atrium. The 5-foot paper statues portrayed construction workers as if they were at a construction site.

Rooks also made the centerpieces for the tables. The centerpieces, which were all handmade, were painted tool pouches made from felt. They will be given to the kindergarten teachers in Manhattan for their students to wear.

Gene Ernst, professor emeritus of architecture, designed the construction look-through cover-up of the clock in the atrium to protect it.

He also helped build the cover-up to the restrooms to imitate portable restrooms found on construction sites.

"I've been involved in the sets for six or seven years with the library. Each year it's a different theme, and this year it was construction, so I helped make the privies."

Ernst said Dollar contacted him about the project in January, and he had a good time working on the project.

"It's always kind of fun," he said.

All the artists came in early Saturday morning to set the place up.

"Dean Rathbone loaned us this room, so then we had to have everything brought in," Rooks said. "And then we couldn't set up until this morning, so we had no idea what things would look like."

Tyson and her husband had helped in the morning and said the hammering of the privies had to be taken outside so they wouldn't interfere with an exam in the Paslay Lecture Hall.

Items like the 46-bottle candle holders with an official gala emblem were used as door prizes.

Rooks said she appreciated all the help from the others in setting the event up.

"They didn't stop working all day," she said. "I think they finished at 4 o'clock, and that is so neat."

▶ FRIENDS OF THE LIBRARY

Gala moves, promotes library

CARY CONOVER
Collegian

The usual business of everyday students passing through the Durland Hall atrium was converted to a formal restaurant setting Saturday evening.

The annual Friends of the Library Gala was brought from its usual location in Farrell Library to Durland, for obvious reasons.

"We usually have it in the library, but it's impossible to do anything in Farrell, so Dean Rathbone was very kind to let us move over here tonight," said Karen McCulloh, assistant to the dean of libraries and secretary of the Friends of the Library.

The construction theme of the gala brought a lively atmosphere to the event.

Participants were able to walk through the room and look at the art while listening to live music.

Meanwhile, waiters and waitresses dressed in black slacks, freshly pressed white shirts and bow ties — complete with hard hats — kept busy filling the glasses of the 160 participants.

McCulloh said the gala, which is an annual fundraiser for the Friends of the Library, not only raises money but is a way of saying thanks to all of the people who donate money.

"Quite frankly, it gives us a lot of recognition, and it shows that we're trying to work for the library, and people often donate substantial funds outside the gala. And it gives us a chance to thank those people who have given us money," she said.

Last year, the Friends of the Library, along with a grant from the National Endowment for the Humanities, raised a total of $135,000.

The amount of money raised Saturday night is not yet totaled.

There is also a Friends of the Library book sale fundraiser. The membership of its sponsors creates funds.

One of the main purposes of the Friends of the Library is to promote and improve the library.

"It's a support group for the library, primarily older alumni and faculty," McCulloh said.

That support comes primarily through fundraising.

Bill Moore, president of the Friends of the Library and professor of veterinary medicine, said Saturday night's dinner alone raised about $10,000 to $20,000.

In addition to the Life Members, Benefactors and Endowers, the majority of the people in attendance were $200 and $100 sponsors.

"We have a list of people, and basically we keep adding to that list people who would like to come to it," Moore said.

"Over a period of a number of years, we've really built up to fairly substantial support from the Friends of the Library," he said.

Moore said the strength of the library and the faculty go hand in hand.

"I think you have good faculty who stay only if they have a good support system. And the library is part of that good support system," he said.

Involvement with SGA still possible

Call or visit your student senator and ask him or her what it takes to be a senator.

Without a full membership, how can a representative body truly function?

It can't.

There are still open slots on the Student Senate ballot. Look at the graphic on Page 1. Look in the Voters' Guide.

No one decided to run for the Student Senate College of Veterinary Medicine seat. The College of Education has six seats available with only four candidates running. The graduate school has five candidates for seven seats.

Are you satisfied with under-representation?

It's not too late to run as a write-in candidate. Write-in candidates do get elected.

They did in last year's election. They got elected the year before that, too.

Call or visit your current student senator and ask him or her what it takes to be a senator.

If you think it doesn't really matter, think again.

Student Senate is involved with the setting of student fees, the allocation of these fees and campus issues such as parking, safety and tuition.

Go into the Student Governing Association office by the K-State Union Courtyard.

Ask some questions.

Get involved.

It's time famous homosexuals are acknowledged

KEVYN JACOBS

History has set the record just a little too straight.

As I am sure you have noticed, I end my column each week with a section I call "Naming the Names."

This section is devoted to a notable person, contemporary or historical, who was homosexual or was involved in a homosexual relationship during his or her life.

These are famous gay people who are shaping our world today or who have shaped our past. They are the figures who have influenced culture and politics, art and religion, life and society and have made our world what it is. We read about them in history books, we watch them on television, and we see their lives recreated for us in movies. But so often, an important part of those lives is left out.

Thanks to our culture's attitude of compulsory heterosexuality, homosexuals and homosexual relationships have been almost written out of history and culture.

So often, historians have avoided mentioning anything about a historical figure's personal life if the personal life were anything but heterosexual. Sure, historians and biographers may know the true story of a historical figure's life, but they haven't always told it. Historians have at times intentionally removed any reference to homosexuality from their work.

Often, this is a case of the historians being uncomfortable in dealing with this aspect of their subjects' lives, especially if the historians feels homosexuality to be sinful. Sometimes, the biographer's subject has relatives currently living that don't want to be embarrassed. Or perhaps the biographer is afraid of tarnishing the image of a hero.

Some historians argue that homosexual relationships in the subject's life have no relevance to telling the story. But these same historians wouldn't hesitate to talk about a subject's heterosexual relationships. This is the double standard of heterosexism — giving a higher value to heterosexual relationships than to homosexual ones.

Straight teen-agers have never had to do without straight role models, the way gay teen-agers have had to do without straight role models.

Fortunately, new generations of biographers have been less hesitant about revealing homosexual aspects of private lives — especially when revealing those homosexual relationships help us to more fully understand the subject as a person.

Among contemporary figures, at least until recently, the media has avoided mentioning a celebrity's relationships — but only if those relationships were not heterosexual. Heterosexual relationships get conspicuously mentioned. Homosexual relationships get conspicuously ignored.

Celebrities have been guilty of facilitating this omission, avoiding being open about their homosexual relationships. Their agents often pressure them into keeping their relationships secret, for fear of "damaging popularity and marketability."

Fortunately, this charade is changing,as more and more celebrities come out publicly.

Mind you, these are not "outings" I am doing here in my column. I am not printing the names of gay celebrities who are closeted. All of the living celebrities I name here have publicly acknowledged the nature of their relationships, and have done so in print. (Believe me, my editor wants me to be sure about this part!)

All of the information I cite on historical figures comes from historians and biographers who have discovered same-gender relationships in that figure's life.

This is not to imply that the historical figures saw themselves as homosexual, because the concept of homosexuality didn't even exist until the late 1800s. It simply means that the subject did have same-gender relationships during his or her life, and braver historians have documented this fact (I can provide these citations upon request.)

Because of the heterosexist omission of famous homosexuals, those of us who are gay have been denied role models, figures we can emulate in our own lives. Homosexuals, just like heterosexuals, need affirming role models that say to us, "See? Look at all of the wonderful people who have been just like you. "

Unfortunately, heterosexuals might not fully comprehend this, since they have always had plenty of heterosexual role models. Straight teen-agers have never had to do without straight role models, the way gay teen-agers have had to do without gay role models.

The omission of homosexual lives from history has also negatively affected heterosexuals by keeping heterosexuals ignorant of what real homosexual lives are like.

Consequently, many heterosexuals have stereotypes in their minds about what homosexuals look and act like. These stereotypes usually bear little resemblance to reality and can easily be challenged by presenting famous homosexual people who don't fit the stereotypes. Often, this results in responses like, "HE was a fag?!? NO WAY!"

So that is why I decided to include the "NAMING THE NAMES" feature in my column each week. It is my way of combating the heterosexism that permeates history and media, and it sets the record a little less straight.

NAMING THE NAMES

Dag Hammarskjold (1905-1961) Secretary General of the United Nations from 1953 to 1961. Hammarskjold was posthumously awarded the Nobel Peace Prize in 1961.

Manhattan ...

A safe place to live

On most Saturday nights, some women will leave parties to walk home alone. They will choose to go for a multitude of reasons.

Each will go her separate way, feeling safe enough to walk home alone.

A typical scenario would also include a gentleman asking if he could walk her home, thinking of her safety and not of another beer.

In a million and one other cities in America, most women wouldn't even feel safe enough to walk home by themselves.

KATHLEEN MASTIO

While not all women feel this way, Manhattan is a very safe place.

Even if some do not feel safe walking home, there are enough gentlemen in Manhattan that chances are someone would walk them home.

Overall, Manhattan is a great place to live. There is very little crime and adequate safety precautions.

Stores like Dillons have hired employees to walk women who are by themselves to their cars after shopping.

The University, as well as the residence halls, offers escort services. Fraternity and sororities also provide a safe ride home for their members.

Police patrols in Aggieville help to prevent crime and provide for the safety of Aggieville patrons.

All of these things aid in creating an environment where citizens are free from harm.

We often take for granted things we don't have to think about. In Manhattan, safety is one of those things.

Escorts are used to a greater extent after a rape or assault, which seems to indicate most women don't think about their freedom from danger a lot or until it is pointed out.

Sitting in a Burger King, no one thinks about getting shot, at least not in Manhattan. At the University of Pennsylvania, the closest Burger King to campus is better known to students as "The Murder King." There are shootings there on a regular basis.

Living in Manhattan certainly has its advantages, the most important being peace of mind.

However, just because Manhattan is a safe place doesn't mean one shouldn't think about personal safety.

Walking home alone, while chances are nothing would happen, probably isn't the best idea. Call a friend, a fraternity or sorority, or 395-SAFE for an escort.

An escort is a lot more fun than a mugging.

Manhattan organizations offer all of these things because prevention is the key to protecting Manhattanites.

Mace or a personal alarm might increase safety or just comfort level. However, they are not a must.

Most women carry their personal alarms in their purse — not a real productive place for it.

On the other hand, Mace can be turned against the user, and wind has a profound effect on its use. In a situation that called for the use of Mace, chances are the wind wouldn't be a No. 1 thought.

The occasional fight in Aggieville hardly constitutes a crime wave. The police provided in Aggieville take care of the problem quickly.

It is important to feel safe in the community in which we live, but it is also important to think twice about safety.

Thinking twice has two productive outcomes: changing actions to become more safety-minded and being thankful for the peace of mind granted by minimal crime in Manhattan.

Today, in America's largest cities, it isn't safe to go to the grocery store, much less go for a walk at night.

Crime can strike at any time or any place, but it is far less likely in Manhattan. We owe that security to police, considerate merchants, greek organizations and residence halls.

Next time you go for a walk, eat out or go grocery shopping, think about your peace of mind and be grateful to live in Manhattan.

Kathleen Mastio is a sophomore in pre-veterinary medicine.

Experienced critic should cover shows

Dear editor,

I wish the Collegian would stop allowing journalism students to critique art shows, performances and other fine-arts events. The average undergraduate simply doesn't have the experience or training to judge these things to tell us why a creative work succeeds or fails. Journalism students shouldn't write critiques about MFA art shows, for example. The artists in those shows have spent years learning to make the design decisions that go into their work.

"The University would be better served if the Collegian recruited graduate students or instructors in art, dance, theater and other areas of fine arts to write critiques."

STEPHEN HOFFMAN
K-State-Salina

The average undergraduate journalism student doesn't understand the vocabulary of art or the design process enough to appreciate those decisions, judge those works or adequately describe those shows. Having gotten my master's degree in journalism at K-State, I can tell you that the average undergraduate journalism student barely understands the process of news reporting, and most don't have the writing skills to express what they are reporting.

The University would be better served if the Collegian recruited graduate students or instructors in art, dance, theater and other areas of fine arts to write critiques.

Campaign materials ruin campus

Dear editor,

I do not remember taking any illicit drugs, but that doesn't seem to stop me from watching the trees all over campus change from green to blue to red and back again. I have inquired, and I am not the only one infected: Everyone I have talked to sees these colors. Have the trees begun to rebel against their natural brown bark? No. They have had this discoloration forced upon them: I smell politics.

"Such beautiful things should not be polluted like that."

freshman undecided

Isn't there a better way to get your name known? I like the sidewalk-chalk combination, and the Collegian is doing a great job, but I can't stand those damn posters tied around the trees! Such beautiful things should not be polluted like that. And not only our sights, but these posters harm the habitat of the K-State squirrel.

I have pitifully watched many a squirrel quiver with fright when it sets its big black squirrel-eyes on these posters from hell. They cannot climb up paper, and those strings aren't conducive to their little squirrel paws. When election day rolls around, I will wonder if the candidates know what they did to the fragile habitat of K-State.

Blair to govern by example and hard work

"Growing up in rural areas has given me a sense of how to work with people."

JEREMY BLAIR
Junior in marketing

Jeremy Blair, student body presidential candidate, said he decided to run for student body president to give something back to the students.

Blair, junior in marketing, served as a Student Senate intern last semester. He said it was a good experience in building his leadership ability.

"At the same time, I saw some inefficiencies, and that is why I got out," Blair said.

Blair said one of the main problems he saw with SGA is that they concentrate too much on internal issues. He said SGA should concentrate on student issues.

"Students are busy getting an education," Blair said. "They don't want to worry about SGA matters and student services."

Most of Blair's other activities involve the College of Business. Blair served as a College of Business ambassador and is currently president of the American Marketing Association.

Blair grew up in northeast Kansas. He was born in Holton and moved to Linden several years later.

Blair

Blair said this might be an advantage, especially since a large percentage of K-State students are from rural areas.

"Growing up in rural areas has given me a sense of how to work with people," Blair said.

Blair said he will govern with a style of leadership that revolves around hard work.

"One of the most important characteristics of a good leader is putting total effort in everything you do," Blair said.

"I have put my all into things," he said. "Some of them have worked out, and some have not, but I still know that I tried."

Blair said he sees hard work as an important part of leadership by example.

"People see that you work hard and want to follow your example," he said.

Reeves would bring public speaking skills to office

"We actually need to think about Union expansion before we do something about it."

CHRIS REEVES
Junior in history

Chris Reeves, who announced his candidacy from his hospital bed Feb. 6, will be running as a write-in candidate in this election.

Reeves, junior in history, decided to run for president after he was attacked off campus.

However, he said time in court and preparing for the national forensics tournament kept him from filing for the position.

Reeves has chosen Brent Lathrom, junior in finance, as his vice presidential running mate.

Two issues are of greatest concern to Reeves in the campaign: campus safety and the K-State Union expansion.

While recuperating from his attack, Reeves received many calls from people all over the country about the safety of the K-State campus.

"One person called me up and said that his child was wanting to attend vet school at K-State," Reeves said. "They are worried about the safety of K-State's campus."

The other issue Reeves said he is concerned about is Union expansion.

Reeves said one problem is that students can no longer get sandwiches in Call Hall since the Subway moved into the Union.

"We actually need to think about Union expansion before we do something about it," Reeves said.

Reeves

Reeves is involved in forensics, speech, Mystery Science Theatre Club and College Republicans.

Reeves said his public speaking ability will be one of his strongest assets as student body president. He also said close ties with several legislators would help to make him effective on state issues.

You won't be seeing any signs or T-shirts for the Reeves-Lethrom campaign. He said posters litter the campus and can be especially messy after the rain.

"T-shirts are a waste of time and resources," Reeves said. "What do you do with them after the elections are over?"

Tomb brings local connections to students

"I'm opinionated, but there is a line I won't cross."

ANDREW TOMB
Senior in political science and speech

Andrew Tomb said his connections to Manhattan could be one of his biggest strengths as student body president.

Tomb was born in Chicago but has grown up in Manhattan. His father is a professor of biology at K-State.

"One of the biggest issues are local issues, and we already have a working relationship with those officials," Tomb said. "We played baseball with their kids, and they know us."

Tomb said he hopes to open an official dialogue between the city and Student Governing Association. He wants his style of leadership to be open and promote dialogue among SGA and all parties.

"One of the first things we plan to do is take the door off of the president's office," Tomb said.

Tomb said he is opinionated, but he is also able to understand more than one side of the story.

"I'm opinionated, but there is a line I won't cross," he said. "I will work for the students, but I will also be able to work with administration and faculty members."

Tomb

Tomb, senior in political science and speech, has been involved in several campus activities. He served as an education senator his sophomore year, and he served as a member of Student Body President Ed Skoog's cabinet the following year.

Tomb is also a member of College Republicans and has been a columnist and the arts and entertainment editor for the Collegian.

Tomb has chosen his brother Mark as his vice presidential running mate. Tomb said he sees little problem in working with his brother.

"He's one person I know I can trust and can depend on," Tomb said. "He's proven himself outside the arena of just being my brother."

Peterson wants another term to serve students

"I have learned a lot about the government process and how to accomplish our goals."

JEFF PETERSON
Graduate student in animal science and industry

Jeff Peterson, incumbent candidate for student body president, said he is proud of the job he and his running mate have done this year.

He would like the chance to serve students for another year.

"I have learned a lot about the government process and how to accomplish our goals," Peterson said.

"We were just average students last year when we ran in the elections, and we've had a successful year," Peterson said.

Peterson has served as president of FarmHouse fraternity, where he lived for two years.

"That was a particularly great experience to be chosen as president, because I lived with those people and they knew me so well," Peterson said.

Several personality qualities have affected Peterson's style of leadership throughout the year.

Peterson said he is a very persistent person and is fairly cautious about making a decision.

"I am very analytical, and I want to have all of the facts before I make a decision," Peterson said.

Peterson

Peterson grew up on a farm in Burdick in central Kansas.

Peterson has also been involved in Block and Bridle, Agriculture Council and Student Alumni Board. He served as an agriculture senator during his freshmen and sophomore years.

He has also served on the Rec Council for four years.

Sports and recreational activities are an integral part of Peterson's lifestyle. He visits the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex five days a week. He also enjoys road racing in his wheelchair and playing in a wheelchair basketball league.

"It helps keep me both physically and mentally fit," Peterson said. "I especially enjoy the competition."

Phillips will continue to motivate others

"Elvis is dead, and so is the voice of the student body."

SCOTT PHILLIPS
Senior in public relations

Scott Phillips, candidate for student body president, said he wants to get all that is possible out of life.

Phillips, who is from Newton, is a senior in public relations with a minor in business.

"I am one of high energy and am always looking for change," Phillips said. "Since I am going to be here another year, I thought I would use those talents to help the student body."

He said he shows his commitment to this by the tattoo of "Carpe Diem" on his ankle.

Phillips began his college career as a major in secondary education. He said he changed majors to give himself more diverse career choices.

"Public relations provides a more flexible environment for me," Phillips said.

No matter what profession you choose, everyone is here to share knowledge and experiences with others, he said.

"We are all here to teach, " Phillips said. "Some of us just do it in different ways than others."

Phillips gained leadership experience as an education senator. He also served as president of the Sigma Phi Epsilon fraternity.

Phillips

Phillips said he likes to have fun, but he stresses his fun usually has a purpose. He used his campaign announcement, where he dressed up as Elvis, as an example.

"Elvis is dead, and so is the voice of the student body," Phillips said. "That was the message we were trying to get across."

Phillips said one of his favorite accomplishments is giving motivational speeches to junior-high students in Colorado, Kansas and Nebraska. He said he plans to speak to school children in Phoenix and Orlando, Fla., this summer.

"My ultimate goal in anything I do is to motivate someone else or some other group," Phillips said.

Ring likes one-on-one contact with students

"I visited both KU and K-State, and there was no comparison."

LIZ RING
junior in history and economics

Liz Ring, student body presidential candidate, has devoted her time to Student Senate for the past three years.

Ring, junior in economics and history, served as a Senate intern her first year, spurred by the encouragement of her Blue Key Leadership teacher.

"I took a leadership class my freshman year sponsored by Blue Key," Ring said. "The Senate chair at that time was my teacher, and he encouraged me to fill out an intern application."

Ring took this advice and has been involved with student government since.

"I like working and meeting a lot of people and feeling like I am accomplishing something for someone else," Ring said.

Ring has served as a senator for two years. She has served as chairman of the Communication Committee and currently serves as Senate vice chair.

Ring is also a member of Arts and Sciences Council and is an Arts and Sciences ambassador.

Ring is a member of Blue Key senior honorary and was a finalist for the Truman scholarship. She lives at the Pi Beta Phi sorority.

Ring

Ring said she enjoys living at the house because of interactions with other people.

"You can develop relationships with all types of people," Ring said. "There is always a friend, or you can always be a friend."

However, Ring said Student Senate has taken over most of her free time.

"This is my only activity anymore," Ring said. "But I devote time to it because I like it."

"I love one-on-one contact with students when we talk about their concerns," Ring said.

Ring, a native of Lincoln, Neb., decided to come to K-State to find a change of scenery.

"I visited both KU and K-State, and there was no comparison," she said.

Union players need to be more professional

MIKE BUNCH

"Say it ain't so ..."

Here we go again, baseball season with "professional" players is on for the summer. Say, isn't "professional" baseball player an oxymoron?

It is too bad that the the replacement players (or "real players," as Phill likes to call them) aren't going to play the season.

I was looking forward to guys going out and busting their asses on the field and playing the game because they love to.

If the "real players" were to start the season, I think baseball would return to the entertaining sport it originally was early in the century.

I wonder what stars of past days would say about our "professionals" and their version of baseball.

Many greats of the game weren't pillars of the community, but at least they had the respect of the public and didn't go on strike.

Ty Cobb, arguably one of the top stars of all time, was also one of the biggest jerks in the game.

Cocky and arrogant, Cobb might not have been popular with others, but he was respected by players and the public because he played the game hard and well.

How many people can say that about today's players?

Most players are egotistical showboaters looking to jump from team to team in search of the most possible money.

When Robin Yount and George Brett retired from the game, so did team loyalty.

Brett was with the Kansas City Royals his entire career, and when you think of Yount, the Milwaukee Brewers come to mind.

Who is left?

Cal Ripken Jr. with Baltimore, though I lost a lot of respect for him after the strike incident. I'm no longer sure if he is worthy enough to break former New York Yankee first baseman Lou "Iron Horse" Gehrig's record of 2,130 consecutive games played, all with the Yankees.

There is an inscription on his monument at Yankee Stadium that reads "A man, a gentleman and a great ball player whose amazing record of 2,130 consecutive games should stand for all time."

I agree wholeheartedly. No player in today's game should have the right to even come close to a record like that.

In addition to being a great player, a star must be respected, likable and unselfish.

Gehrig met all those qualities and more; he was an outstanding player.

Many of Gehrig's lifetime statistics are still team records for the Yankees.

He had 2,721 hits, a .340 batting average, 493 home runs and 1,990 RBIs. He was also the first Yankee to win the triple crown, hitting .363 with 49 home runs and 165 RBIs in 1934.

Gehrig played until illness forced him from the game. When he retired, he was a national hero, honored with parades and a speech in Yankee Stadium.

Brett and Yount were both given great respect when they retired and are both bound for the Hall of Fame.

I don't think they were given the same outstanding fanfare as Gehrig, but both deserved it.

I don't think there is a single person in baseball right now who is an absolute cultural icon who receives or deserves the same amount of respect.

What would the great Gehrig say about the state of baseball?

I don't know for sure, but judging from what I have learned about the man, I bet he wouldn't have tolerated it.

It's too bad bringing back the "professional" players won't bring back professionalism to the sport.

Attitudes and pouting add nothing to the game. Wait — I guess they do add something: distaste and distrust.

I don't know how long the "professionals" will stay in the game without a new agreement, but if they jump again, I say baseball is better off without them.

I hope "professionals" bring something back besides greed. If not, give the "real" ballplayers their due.

I will gladly pay to see spirit and enthusiasm put back into the game.

Wentland places first in high jump

WESS HUDELSON
Collegian

Gwen Wentland brought home first place in the high jump at the Texas Relays Saturday in Austin, Texas.

Thirty-six competitors were shooting for the title that Wentland captured with a leap of 6 feet 4 inches.

The leap equaled her best performance of the outdoor season and set a new Texas Relays record.

"My legs were pretty sore because I've been training so hard the last few weeks," Wentland said.

"Normally, I wouldn't like to compete in a meet with so many people, but this time I think it helped because it gave me extra time to stretch."

Wentland cleared 6'4" earlier this season at the College Station Relays at Texas A&M while competing in the heptathlon.

The effort tied Olympic gold medalist Jackie Joyner-Kersee's American record for the high jump while competing in the heptathlon.

Wentland said she plans to train hard and compete less during April.

"I'm not competing next weekend at Oklahoma, and I'm just going to long jump at the KU Relays," Wentland said. "I'm going to train hard for the rest of April and lay off competing so much. I have a pretty busy month in May, and I don't want to get tired."

Wanita Dykstra and Jill Montgomery finished fourth and seventh in the high jump, each with a clearance of 5'9-3/4".

Kristen and Kirsten Schultz placed seventh and 10th in the javelin at the meet with tosses of 156' and 149'2" respectively.

Ed Broxterman did not place in high jump. He cleared a bar of 7'3/4" at the meet.

"It wasn't a good day for me," Broxterman said.

"The crowd and the meet was great, but I just didn't jump very well. I don't know what went wrong."

Because of the size of the meet, the athletes competing were forced to wait extended periods of time before they could compete.

"I got down to the pit at about 1:00 and finished jumping about 4:30," Broxterman said. "That was only about five or six jumps.

"With that many good people, I don't mind the competition, and it was a lot of fun to be there, but I don't really like competing against so many people."

Other athletes experienced a run of bad luck at the meet as well.

Coach Cliff Rovelto said Karissa Owens slightly strained her hamstring while running her leg of the 1,600 meter relay and could not finish.

Travis Livingston fell during the 110-meter hurdles and failed to complete his race.

It was the first time Livingston failed to finish a 110-meter hurdle race in his career — high school or college.

However, the women's sprint medley relay did finish its race. They placed fourth with a time of 3:49.79.

"I think some of these meets are becoming really archaic," Rovelto said.

"It's a good experience for the kids to come to something like this, but if you take a large number of athletes from our team there, I don't think you can say that your team has gotten better by going to these things."

K-State will travel to Norman, Okla., Saturday for the John Jacobs Invitational at Oklahoma University.

Home sweet home.

Well, maybe not for the K-State tennis team.

The Wildcats lost their third straight home match in Big Eight Conference play Saturday, dropping a 5-4 decision to the No. 41-ranked Colorado Buffaloes.

With the loss, the Cats fell to 7-9 overall and 1-3 in the conference.

"Basically, we have not sustained the kind of effort we have to sustain to do well as a team," K-State tennis coach Steve Bietau said. "A perfect example would be understanding what we need to do on the court and not doing it until we're behind. We fight to get out of trouble. The sustaining part is just not happening."

Wildcat all-American Karina Kuregian, No. 13 nationally in singles, claimed her 10th consecutive victory with a 6-3, 6-1 win against Chris Bowers.

Kuregian improved her singles record to 24-5.

Chris Schulte was victorious in a 6-4, 6-4 No. 4 singles match against Cameron Monroe.

The Cats also took two out of three matches in the doubles division.

The No. 14-ranked team of Kuregian and Martine Shrubsole had a tough time putting away its opponent.

The duo had no problem in its opening set but struggled somewhat the rest of the way in a hard 6-1, 4-6, 6-3 win against the No. 38-ranked pair of Karen McIntosh and Nathalie Dickson.

The victory was Kuregian and Shrubsole's second straight and 12th in their last 13 tries.

In No. 2 doubles, Dinah Watson and Karen Nicholson fought off Bowers and Monroe for a 6-4, 0-6, 6-1 win.

Bietau said he feels his team could be more competitive in match play.

"I want them all," Bietau said.

"Do I think we could win any match? Yes, I do.

"We lost three of our singles matches because mentally and emotionally we did not do a good job."

Next up for K-State is a match-up with rival and No. 33-ranked Kansas.

"They are a tough team," Bietau said.

"We have to keep dealing with our own team's strengths and weaknesses. I hope we can give them a good match."

The tennis version of the Sunflower Showdown is scheduled for 2 p.m. Wednesday at the L.P. Washburn Tennis Complex.

OU takes 3 from Cats during weekend

NICOLE POELL
Collegian

There seems to be a pattern here.

Win four in a row, lose. Win four in a row, lose.

The Wildcat baseball team continued this pattern in its weekend series against the Oklahoma Sooners, losing all three games after going 4-0 at home last week. Friday night's action saw Sooner ace Mark Redman strike out a career-high 13 batters and give up just five hits en route to OU's 6-1 win.

With the victory, Redman, now 8-2 on the year, has struck out 25 in his last 14 innings and did not walk a batter in his fourth straight game. The Cats managed just six hits against Redman, three of those coming from junior Chris Hess, who was 3 for 4 on the night.

OU racked up 12 hits against the Cats, including solo shots from Tristan Paul, Damon Minor and Javier Flores. K-State scored its only run of the game in the fifth, but the Sooners answered back with two more in the bottom of the inning. Taking the loss for K-State was Eric Yanz, who moves to 3-4 on the year.

The Cats didn't fare much better in Saturday's game, losing 10-7. OU's Tristan Paul led the Sooner's scoring drive with three hits in the game while driving in four runs. His two-run homer gave the Sooners a 2-0 lead in the first inning.

The Sooners added another run before K-State answered with four runs in the third to take the lead. But the Cats' advantage was short-lived. OU came back with another run in the fourth to tie up the game, then took the lead for good with a two-run fifth inning.

The Cats' Jack Witt took the loss, as his record goes to 2-2 on the season. Leading the Cats at the plate was Todd Fereday, who was 3 for 4.

The two teams met for the final game of the series Sunday afternoon. Official statistics for this game were not available, but once again, the Sooners prevailed in their 7-3 victory.

K-State is now 17-14 on the year and 4-9 in Big Eight play. The Cats take on Missouri at 7 p.m. Tuesday night at Frank Myers Field.

Cats swing back into action today

BERNIE HANEY
Collegian

The men's and women's golf teams begin play today in their last tournament before the Big Eight Championships.

The men's team is in Birmingham, Ala., for the Bent Brook/Blazer Invitational.

The women's squad is playing in the Eskimo Pie/Susie Maxwell tournament in Norman, Okla.

A lot is at stake for the men's team. It has a chance to qualify for the NCAA Central Regional in Houston.

"We're still in a position where mathematically we're in there, but if we play well the last two tournaments and beat Iowa State and Nebraska, we will be there," K-State golf coach Mark Elliott said.

Two years ago was the first time in K-State history the golf team qualified for regional play.

The Bent Brook/Blazer Invitational has 18 teams in the field. A 54-hole tournament, it is held on three different nine-hole courses at the Bent Brook Golf Course.

"Birmingham is a neat tournament," Elliott said.

"Nebraska and Iowa State are there, so it has some importance as far as the NCAA regionals."

Last year's team placed in a tie for sixth out of 13 teams when it played in Birmingham.

Elliott said the team has the potential to be good, but all five players need to score well at the same time.

"We've got good players, but if we could get all five of them to play up to their capabilities for three rounds, nobody would beat us," Elliott said.

The hot player for the Wildcats heading into today's play is junior Scott Hovis.

In the spring season, he hasn't finished lower than sixth place in the three tournaments.

"He's really worked hard on his game and swing. His control of the ball is so much better than it used to be," Elliott said.

"He played defensive all fall, and now I think he is more comfortable with his swing. He has worked hard, and it's paying off for him."

Elliott said he wants the team to gain some confidence on this trip and get back to playing up to its capability.

"It's a tournament that we could play well, but more importantly for those guys is to gain some confidence," Elliott said. "They have been beaten down the last two tournaments.

"You hope they go down there and play well, come back and give them a couple days off, then get ready for the Big Eight."

The women's team is playing in a 54-hole tournament at the Trails Golf Club.

They have had a couple weeks of practice since their third-place finish at the Southwest Missouri State Invitational on March 27-28.

Elliott said the team has had an up-and-down spring season, but the players' lack of confidence is their main concern.

"For them, it's confidence. Their No. 1 thing is confidence," Elliott said.

"They have the physical talents, but do they have the mental talents?"

Last year's team finished 10th out of 12 teams in the Eskimo Pie/Susie Maxwell tournament.

The leader on the women's team is senior Jacque Wright, who has placed fifth, seventh and 16th in the three spring tournaments.

Elliott said the team has the potential to score well at the Trails Golf Club.

"It's a course if you play well, you can really score," Elliott said. "They have been in the upper 330s and low 340s, which is a joke. They are more of a 315 to 330 type of team."

The lowest score the women's team has shot in the spring season was a second-round total of 320 at the Texas A&M/Welsh Memorial tournament.

The Big Eight Championships for the women's team is during the same time as the men's team on April 24-25. They will travel to Oklahoma and play at the Stillwater Country Club.

Brownback gives views

Politician talks about leadership, Jesus on campus

JANICE SWICKARD
Collegian

Every moment counts.

"We are only on Earth for a moment, and what you do with that fraction of time is very important," Rep. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., said.

Students and members of the community gathered Saturday morning to hear Brownback speak on his views of leadership and Jesus.

Brownback said he accepted Jesus Christ into his life at age 13 and has been leaning on him for quite some time.

"Jesus has given me several different talents, and it is up to me to use them," Brownback said. "We are all given opportunities to influence people, and I felt that my calling was when I ran for Congress."

Brownback said we all have a vector to follow in life. He said we have a spiritual course and a course of the flesh. He compared our vector with that of Jesus, and he said we should follow the vector that Jesus pursued — things of the spirit.

Brownback said many people set their vector in college because it is a time for seeking and searching. He said that we shouldn't look past anything that would give us a chance to change something for the better.

"America is in search of its soul. People seem to be losing values in this country, and it's time for the country to rectify itself," he said.

Brownback said in the 1960s, people were looking to free themselves from any restrictions such as marriage, and they lost a lot of their values in the process.

"People felt that they needed to be free of everything, and now our country's morals have been decreasing," he said.

Brownback said it's sad to see so many divorces and young mothers. There are so many children having children, and that is very discouraging to see, he said.

"We all have a book that Jesus has written for us; the novel is there," he said. "Now, we just have to walk with Jesus in the right direction."

Brownback opened the meeting for discussion, asking for people to share their views with him.

Chuck Allen, junior in elementary and secondary education and journalism and mass communications, asked how to incorporate Jesus into his classroom and bring Jesus back into the school without upsetting people.

Brownback said instead of separating church and school, the nation has removed the church altogether. He said he would like to see prayer back at graduations.

"It is something that has been lost in our system, and I don't want teachers to get discouraged. It is important to share the feeling of the Lord," he said.

▶ HORSEMAN'S ASSOCIATION

Horse-cutting championship rides into K-State arena

JILL TEGTMEIER
Collegian

Once a calf is in front of a good cutting horse, it has little hope of returning to the herd.

That's the idea behind the sport of cutting.

The horse positions itself between the calf and the rest of the herd. If the calf strays, four men on horses at the corners of the arena turn the calf back to face the horse.

"It's an old game, but it has gradually grown more popular," said Dean Smith, cutting horse trainer from Council Grove.

Saturday and Sunday, more than 200 runs took place in Weber Arena at the Championship Cutting Horse Competition put on by the Kansas State Horseman's Association.

Competitors were given 2-1/2 minutes to let their horses show their stuff.

As soon as a calf is picked out of the herd, the rider gives a signal, and the horse does the rest.

Riders can't visibly cue, rein or touch the horses, or they will be penalized.

Becky Teff, treasurer of Kansas State Horseman's Association, said scoring a horse depends on what the judge is looking for. Sixty to 70 points is the average range competitors are awarded.

"You look at how the horse goes into the herd, how they work the cattle and what the character and personality of the horse is," she said.

Show manager Rick Gates said a horse should walk into the herd quietly with its ears forward and not be jumping around.

"A good horse will lock onto the calf and pay attention to all the movements the calf makes," he said.

Teff said the Horseman's Association took over the cutting competition three years ago from Dennis and Sharon Claeys, who had it in Prairie Downs.

"It is a big financial burden for a couple. They didn't have the help they needed to pull the show together, and they thought it would be nice to get the University involved again," Gates said.

"K-State has had lots of cutting shows in years past," Gates said.

Gates said the Claeys helped a lot with the preliminary work — knowing who to call and when to call them.

Smith, who has shown cutting horses for 36 years, said he couldn't ask for a better arena to compete in.

"Everybody pitches in here, and the competition is a good thing. They just need to keep it up," he said.

Smith said cutting is one of the most competitive horse events.

"The horse naturally wants to work cattle. It's like a bird dog with quail," he said.

"A winning horse is always born. Bloodlines play a big thing in a cutting horse. If you've got a smart horse, then it's easy for them to learn what you teach them. They're just like people in that respect," Smith said.

The competition is Kansas State Horseman's biggest fundraiser of the year, said Mara Barngrover, vice president of Kansas State Horseman's.

"Becky does a lot of the organization work, and we use our manpower to make it go," she said.

The proceeds from the competition are used for numerous things throughout the year, Teff said.

"We use the money we make to build fence at the Horse Unit, donate money to the Horse Judging Team, bring in speakers to talk about horse issues, and we also use it to finance trips for our members to go on," she said.

Smith said he hopes Kansas State Horseman's can continue having the competition.

"Cutting is a pretty amazing thing. Everyone who gets on and rides loves it. I guess it just becomes kind of a disease," Smith said.

Students from across nation participate in floral contest

CARRIE LININ
Collegian

Eleven teams from across the country competed in the 54th annual National Intercollegiate Floral Crop Quality Evaluation and Floral Design Contest Thursday and Friday at the K-State Union.

"Some of the schools that attended the contest took side trips to different botanical gardens on their way to K-State," said Alice LeDuc, assistant professor of horticulture, forestry and recreation.

Alan Stevens, assistant professor in horticultural, forestry and recreation, said the K-State judging team was well-prepared.

"They spent two nights a week, and plus, on Saturday, we would travel to different greenhouses around the state and spent 14 to 15 hours doing nothing but practicing," he said.

"They put in a lot of hard work and long hours."

Other schools had structured classes to prepare for the contest.

"We have a one-hour credit class, and we meet every Tuesday night from 5:30 to 8:30. We are graded on participation, so if we go every Tuesday, we get an A," said Steven Lott, a senior in ornamental horticulture from Oklahoma State University.

Lynn Newsome, a junior in ornamental horticulture from California Polytech State University, said her team prepared through a class at her university, and the top contenders were then picked to go to the contest.

"We feel we are very well-prepared for the contest," Newsome said.

The evaluation contest is divided up into two categories with three members from each school on a team.

"A student can train for two years in a row, but you can only judge once," Stephanie Duerksen, junior in horticulture, said.

LeDuc said team coaches from all of the universities set up the classes and then judge them as to which will be in the competition and what order each class is in.

Thursday's competition was potted plants, which are defined as any plants grown in soil.

Student judges have three minutes to rank four containers of plants from best to worst.

"They are judging on many different things. They are looking for cut flower perfection, presentation and cultural perfection," LeDuc said.

Friday's competition was floral design.

LeDuc said the students had 45 minutes to complete the design Friday morning.

Professional florists helped with the floral design contest on the second day of the competition.

At the end of the contest, awards were given out in four categories.

The first award was given to the student judge who received the highest number of points. This award was given to Marcel Hicks from California Polytech State University.

Hicks also won the cut flowers category.

The third award given went to Jay Bohock from Texas A&M for the highest number of points in the potted-plants category.

■ California Polytech State University won the team award for the highest number of points.

LeDuc said most of the flowers were donated by various wholesale cut-flower growers or wholesale distributors.

K-State also won awards in all divisions.

■ Kandace Kelly, senior in horticulture, won fifth for individual overall and third in potted plants.

■ Duerksen won 10th in potted materials.

■ Jozie Schimke, senior in horticulture, and James Miller, freshman in mechanical engineering, won first place in floral design in Division II classes one and two.

▶ SCIENCE

Speaker focuses on need for accuracy

SARA SMITH
Collegian

Scientists have to learn to present their findings in a way everyone can understand, one of the most prominent scientists in the country said Friday.

Ruth Patrick told an audience of her experiences as a young female scientist in the 1940s.

Patrick, a Topeka native, said she was once told she couldn't lead a research project because of her gender.

"In no way could a young woman manage it, because women wasted money," said Patrick, who was 24 at the time the comment was made.

Patrick said she also ran into resistance when she decided to work with industry.

"Many of my colleagues thought I was wasting my life to do so," she said. "This was the impression of the theoretical scientists about industry."

Patrick said the condition of some of the rivers in the United States in the '40s was terrible, with some of them catching on fire.

"I was told, though I never saw it, that the Delaware River would turn red or green depending on the waste that was in it," she said.

Patrick said she thought scientists had an obligation to be as accurate as possible when presenting their findings.

"We are not serving society well until we do work that is scientifically sound and present the results in a way the legislators and public can understand," she said.

Patrick said it was a good idea to popularize science, but she warned against using scare tactics.

"I don't think false statements ever advance science," she said.

Patrick concluded her lecture with a warning about the condition of the environment.

"We're going to have to try to restore the naturalness to the places where damage has occurred," she said. "Few people realize how interlocked our biosphere is."

After the lecture, a woman from the audience asked Patrick what it had been like to be the only female graduate student in her field.

"Well, I can tell you. Nice," Patrick replied.

Abigail Conrad, research assistant in biology, said she thought Patrick's accomplishments were even more impressive because she began her work in the '40s.

"I think that she's a remarkable person, not only for the period of time she lived in, but for any period of time," Conrad said.

BRANDON PECK/COLLEGIAN

Reader has time, requests book review

Dear Cassie,

Since the Collegian frequently tries different ideas, would it be possible to include a book review of popular books? Although few people have a lot of time, it seems as though many students, faculty and staff keep up with the books on the market.

Signed Turning Pages,

Dear Pages,

It is a nice idea, and I submitted it into the suggestion box for next year's arts and entertainment editor. Time is more than a slight problem, though. Personally, I haven't read a book for pleasure since sometime during the Middle Ages, and I know many of our reporters here barely have time for skimming their texts. Trying to cover the latest on the bestseller list might be pushing us a little too far. Good idea, though.

Brewery looks for new flavors, logos for beer

NOLAN SCHRAMM
COBY HESS
Collegian

Rob Moline has what some people would call the best job in the world. He gets to think about beer, make beer, read about beer and drink beer every day.

Moline is the new brewmeister at the Little Apple Brewing Company, which will reopen to the public April 17 under new management.

He is responsible for hand-crafting the seven new beers the brewery will be selling. It is an art that predates modern history, extending into the B.C. era.

People collected grains, made breads from it, and ate the bread. Eventually, the grain got wet and the yeast in the air fermented it.

"Some brave soul ate it or drank it or chewed it and got a buzz off it. And he said 'Ahh — this is good.' So they started doing it again, trying to replicate it," Moline said.

Moline said making beer is no longer an art.

"There's a science to it — and that varies from brewer to brewer," Moline said. "Six brewers could take the same recipe and each produce a beer that would be different."

Different would surely describe the latest in Moline's lineup of seven microbrewed beers, one being a jalapeno beer, aptly named "Friendly Fire." He calls it a work of art.

Speaking of art, Little Apple is looking for design ideas for its company logo and all seven in-house beers.

Moline is inviting submissions of designs for use on the restaurant's beer bottle labels, posters, coasters and other display materials.

Prizes for creativity include $50 gift certificates in each category, and $100 gift certificates will be awarded to best design in all categories.

"We want to be able to serve a brilliant beer here, and we want our labels to reflect that," he said. "Everyone has seen beer labels. Creativity is what we're after."

The artwork is also intended to be used as a basis for future marketing plans of the brewery, Moline said.

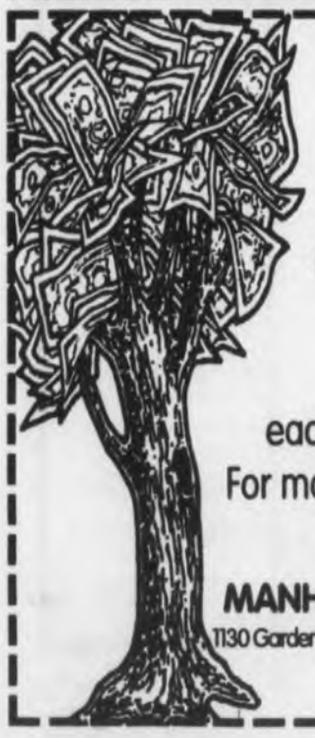
"We want something that will be an attractive complement to our products," he said.

The eight categories for logo designs include the company logo — Little Apple Brewing Company, Wildcat Wheat, Custer's Golden Ale, Big Red Ale, Prairie Pale Ale, Friendly Fire, Pony Express Porter and Black Angus Stout.

The maximum size for all logo entries is 11 inches by 17 inches. Four colors can be used, and the company's name must be included in all of the designs.

The deadline for entries is May 1.

CONTEST



The Little Apple Brewing Company is sponsoring a design contest for beer logos. For more information on the details of the contest, call Rob Moline at 539-5500.

Mark "Buzz" Preston, lead singer and guitarist of Horizontal Mambo, a blues and jazz band out of Kansas City, performs his rendition of a popular Bob Marley tune at Rowdy Trouty's.

▶ REVIEW

Band has distinct blues sound

MIKE HILL
Collegian

People in passing cars outside Rowdy Trouty's kept turning their heads to see where the incredible guitar licks and strong keyboard sounds were coming from.

The rhythm-and-blues band Horizontal Mambo took the stage Friday night at Trouty's to play to an older crowd of about 50 people.

Mark Preston, guitarist and the band's only remaining original member, said Horizontal Mambo has been playing for six years.

"We started this band in October of '89, but we've all been playing for over 20 years," he said.

Preston said even though Horizontal Mambo is from Kansas City, it doesn't play there often.

"We play out of town more than we do in Kansas City," he said.

Preston said all the members in the band have been playing for a number of years and now their hard work is beginning to pay off.

"We're trying to build a following, which we are managing to do around the Midwest," he said.

The name Horizontal Mambo was found in a song of his favorite band, Preston said.

"It's a line from a Little Feet song, and Little Feet is my favorite band. I brought it up as a joke, and everybody loved it," he said.

Even though the name of the group was originally a joke, it has been a real asset, Preston said.

"People remember it," he said.

Another thing you will remember if you hear the group Horizontal Mambo play is Preston's incredible guitar playing and Greg Hockett's strong performance on the keyboard.

The group plays a variety of music from Motown to Stevie Ray Vaughn to spiced-up versions of Bob Marley songs. Every song has a distinct blues sound to it.

A guitar solo can be expected in every song, which shows the group knows its strength lies in Preston's guitar playing.

Horizontal Mambo did a good job changing tempo, as was shown when it played the Jeff Healey Band's "Angel Eyes."

The song brought many of the older patrons to their feet, slow dancing around the bar.

Although the group's musical ability is obvious, its vocal skills are sometimes weak.

Preston and Hockett share the lead vocal duties, and often the vocals are overpowered by the band's loud music.

Phillip Stewart, K-State alumnus, also said the vocals could use some help.

"The vocals need work, but the rhythm is really good," he said.

Jim Davel, K-State alumnus, said the members of Horizontal Mambo rocked despite their age.

"For being older, they're pretty damn good," he said.

Cause of ailment still a mystery

ASSOCIATED PRESS

DURHAM, N.C. — Anti-nerve gas pills combined with anti-insect compounds may be the cause of a mysterious cluster of ailments known as Gulf War syndrome, researchers said.

Duke University Medical Center researchers tested nerve gas pills, insect repellents and insecticides given to U.S. troops during the Gulf War and discovered nervous system damage in laboratory animals, the Herald-Sun of Durham reported Sunday.

The team's lead scientist warned that no undisputed link has been established between the chemicals and insecticides and the ailments reported by about 37,000 veterans of the war. But that's where the preliminary findings point, said Mohamed Abou-Donia, deputy director of Duke's toxicology program.

"I'm confident we have more than a hypothesis," he said. "We have very solid data to demonstrate we have a plausible scenario of what could have happened in the Gulf War."

In every case, the lab animals — chickens — exposed to the combination of chemicals suffered nervous system damage like that suffered by veterans.

Last month, the Pentagon's top doctor said no single cause of Gulf War syndrome had been found. Dr. Stephen Joseph released updated figures of a Pentagon medical evaluation program of Gulf War veterans showing that in 84 percent of cases a clear diagnosis of health problems could be found.

Of the 2,074 cases analyzed, Pentagon doctors were unable to diagnose about 16 percent in the study complaining of fatigue, headaches and sleep disturbances.

About 15,000 veterans are participating in the Pentagon program.

Ross Perot, a long-time veterans advocate, gave the Duke researchers $150,000 for the study that began last July.

Abou-Donia said the Department of Veterans Affairs has invited him to Washington to present his data. The study is nearly ready for publication, he said.

"We're not saying this is what happened in the Gulf War," Abou-Donia said. "What we have done so far is a simulation, to some extent, of what might have happened."

The next step, he said: understanding how it happens.

One possible reason some veterans got sick and others didn't is that each person's ability to deal with toxic chemicals varies. Also, some veterans may have been exposed to higher doses of chemicals, Abou-Donia said.

Another toxicologist said the Duke team's research will be hard to prove.

"It's a kind of scenario that is fairly easy to construct but difficult to prove," said Ernest Hodgson, head of the toxicology department at North Carolina State University in Raleigh. He isn't involved in the study.

The Duke researchers have compared the animals' blood samples with blood samples from about a dozen Gulf War veterans.

If the researchers can uncover a biological fingerprint in the blood samples, that could be used to diagnose veterans with Gulf War illness, Abou-Donia said.

Clinton to review minority-hiring programs

ASSOCIATED PRESS

SACRAMENTO, Calif. — President Clinton told a Democratic audience including many vocal affirmative action activists on Saturday that the party must be sensitive to grievances of "so-called angry white males" and be prepared to abandon minority preference programs that don't work.

Jumping into the battle for public opinion for the next 100 days, Clinton gave the strongest defense yet of his decision to order a top-to-bottom review of such programs — already under fierce assault from the Republican majority in Congress.

"We have to realize that there is a real problem out there. We can't deny that," Clinton said.

Clinton had been expected to focus his speech, to a meeting of the state Democratic party, on a repetition of his problems with remaining items in the GOP "Contract with America," and his vow to veto programs that make large cuts in education, environmental and other social programs.

He did that at first. But, confronted with hundreds of activists in the audience waving green signs proclaiming "No Retreat — Stand up for Affirmative Action," Clinton launched into an impassioned defense of his decision to review affirmative action programs.

"We don't have to retreat from these programs. ... But we do have to ask ourselves — are they all working? Are they fair?

"This is psychologically a difficult time for a lot of white males, the so-called angry white males ... most of them are working harder for less money than they were making 15 years ago."

His words at first drew chants of "no retreat, no retreat" from the sign-waving activists.

"Don't scream, let's talk," he said at one point. "That's just what they want us to do. They want to get this country into a screaming match. ... We have to lower our voices."

An initiative proposed for the 1996 ballot in California would repeal state affirmative action laws for government employment, contracting and university admissions.

The proposal, drafted by two college professors and supported by Republican Gov. Pete Wilson, requires 600,000 signatures to qualify.

Supporters want the Legislature to vote to put the issue before voters next March — at the time of California's newly shifted presidential primary. Failing that, supporters say they will qualify it themselves for November 1996.

TIPS FOR WRITING A CLASSIFIED AD

Always put what item or service you are advertising first. This helps potential buyers find what they are looking for.

Don't use abbreviations. Many buyers are confused by abbreviations.

Consider including the price. This tells buyers if they are looking at something in their price range.

CATEGORIES

To help you find what you are looking for, the classified ads have been arranged by category and sub-category. All categories are marked by one of the large images, and sub-categories are preceded by a number designation.

WE DO NOT USE PHONE NUMBERS OR LAST NAMES IN PERSONALS.

London's New Vic Theatre performs Geoffrey Chaucer's "Canterbury Tales" Friday night in McCain Auditorium.

▶ THEATER

'Tales' get plenty of laughs

NOLAN SCHRAMM
Collegian

Zany British comedy took the stage Friday night with the New Vic Theatre of London's performance of Geoffrey Chaucer's "Canterbury Tales."

Six tales of raw, unadulterated humor had the audience rolling in the aisles. The New Vic Theatre's adaptation of Chaucer's literary classic has a rich history.

Originally written just after the invention of the printing press, Chaucer's tale focused on a group of people on a pilgrimage. To keep each other occupied along the way, they told stories.

To make things interesting, they decided that the one who came up with the best story would win a certain sum of money.

The New Vic Theatre's adaptation of the story focused on six of these tales.

Each character would tell a story reminiscent of his or her self. For example, the star of the show was Miller, played by Micky O'Donoughue.

During every scene change, Miller would rush on stage and entertain with his jesting.

"This doctor goes into a patient's room with a suppository behind his ear. Patient says to him 'Doctor, what's that suppository behind your ear for?'

"The doctor gets this puzzled look on his face, turns around and starts out of the room. Patient says to him 'Hey doc, where are you going?' He says, 'I've got to find that woman who has my pencil.'"

"Wait! I've got more," he said, waving his arms frantically as the audience laughed.

The show took theater a step further than other productions — it was built upon a solid foundation of satirical, witty British humor and audience participation.

Some stories were an exception. The Pardoner's Tale, for example, was not outright humorous, but its characters were funny in their stupidity.

Jack Power spun a tale of three brothers, Tom, Dick and Harry, who are brawling drunks. When news reaches them that someone in the village has died, they demand to know who killed him.

"Death" is the reply. In their cocky attitudes, they immediately swear on Satan's claw to set out to find death and kill him.

To balance the seriousness of this tale, others were less serious. One example was the Reeves Tale, a story about some students from Trinity Warden School who stay the night at a grain miller's house. And, of course, he has a beautiful daughter. Oh, and they all sleep in the same bed.

The tale gets funnier as the characters stretch a sheet over the stage, wide side facing the audience to simulate an overhead view.

When nighttime comes, so does a little hanky panky. Needless to say, characters jumping up and down in front of a wide sheet to simulate sex raised the levels on the ol' Laugh-O-Meter.

The die-hard theater aficionado may be offended by this slapstick approach to acting, but anyone who might have protested would have found his defenses quickly crumbling.

anniversary were focused on communities working together.

"We are promoting a spirit of cooperation in terms of bringing Manhattan and K-State together," he said.

Carney said UPC didn't necessarily plan events around a specific theme, but he agreed that Nelson's speech was an important event.

"He can bring an incredible amount of insight and history into Earth Day," Carney said.

The Earth Day 25th Anniversary Celebration will begin today with "Prophets and Loss," a video focusing on the environmental crisis, at 7 p.m. in Union 212.

correctly answer questions as their roommates would, said Alice Harmon, sophomore in agriculture economics and math.

The questions ranged from "What is their favorite song?" to "If you were temporarily insane and you found Mr. Wrong, how would your roommate tell you?" Harmon said.

"When we got to later rounds, we got questions that we had no idea what the answer was. We had to guess. There were some questions that you really wouldn't know about someone else," said Gordon Kimble, junior in architecture and Haymaker participant.

The crowd became involved as they played Amoeba, which is an elimination game.

"There were a lot of our friends there, and they had a lot of fun. Some of the answers were funny," Kimble said.

In Family Feud, surveys were passed out to the residence halls. The seven participating halls then tried to answer various questions in the same manner as the survey respondents.

The game ran just like the TV show, but people making strikes had to wear a fluorescent poster with a large black X on it strapped over their shoulders to hang on their front and back.

People were also used as buzzers as they were hit on top of their heads.

"It went over well. They thought it was funny," Harmon said.

The traditional bed race provided a few moments of excitement.

"One guy from Goodnow flew off of the bed, and an ambulance and the police were called," said Paul English, sophomore in history and secondary education.

The individual was fine, except for some scratches and bruises, and he continued to race with his team.

Haymaker, Van Zile and Goodnow won first, second and third respectively, while the Marlatt-West team won the decorating contest.

The travel path included three pit stops where the four members riding traded places with the four that were pushing the bed.

The bed races in previous years used to be an hour long, while this year's was about five minutes. The need to remain on campus and campus construction were considerations this year.

"The route I picked, I thought, was the best one," English said.

There were also places to answer '60s trivia questions and guess the correct prices for common items that could be purchased in the K-State Union or in Manhattan.

English said he enjoyed planning the bed races.

"This is one of the old standing traditions," English said. "I was glad I had a chance to be a part of it. I had fun putting it together."

Marlatt became a two-time winner Saturday afternoon as the team members won both the volleyball and kickball games.

In kickball, Marlatt beat Smurthwaite in extra innings by a score of 11-7. Marlatt then beat Haymaker in volleyball.

"It went real well. We had good sportsmanship, with people joking around with other teams as well as each other," Bill Dillon, freshman in environmental design, said.

The volleyball game followed traditional rules, while kickball had a few rules regarding the number of home runs that could be scored.

After two home runs in a game, the rest counted as a ground-rule double, and a team could only go through its lineup once in an inning, Dillon said.

In addition, the kickball lasted either 45 minutes or five innings, whichever came first.

The seven participating halls had about 90 to 100 competitors with some individuals participating in both events, Dillon said.

Dillon said the event didn't take a lot of time to plan.

"It was worth it and lots of fun. It didn't take much time," he said.

The canoe races on Sunday were canceled because of the weather, and the weekend ended with an ice cream social on Sunday night.

"For the most part, I was happy with what we had planned and how it turned out," Trowbridge said.

Cultural Nite offers ethnic diversity

"I like the instrument because it sounds good, and it has a beautiful shape," Huang said.

The Pakistan Students Association performed a pre-wedding ceremony.

This ceremony is a colorful gathering of family and friends who prepare the bride and groom for their wedding day.

The German Folk Song Choir performed four songs, two of which were composed by Beethoven and Mozart.

The crowd cheered for the Manhattan and Junction City Filipino Dance Troupe's performance of three dances.

One of the dances is called "Pardanggo Sa Illan." It involved balancing a candle on the head and holding one in each hand while performing the dance.

Rafael Pabon, graduate student in food science; Victor Sosa, freshman in professional piloting; Jorge Gonzalez, graduate student in food science; and Eduardo Arce, graduate student in economics, gave the crowd a taste of Latin America.

The group began playing as a hobby last semester. The members perform at cultural events and at Mexican restaurants in Manhattan.

"We enjoy it very much and have a lot of fun," Arce said.

Pabon said they play songs that their parents used to sing.

Manal Kara, 8, played with the African Drum Group.

She said she started playing because her dad is in the group and she likes to play the drums.

The Puerto Rico Baila, a folkloric dance group, has members from a wide range of academic majors.

The group started in 1992 when there was a Latin American Cultural Night and there was a need for a presentation of the Puerto Rican culture.

They performed an assortment of Puerto Rican dances and gave information about the dances and culture of the country.

Patti Noisaengsri, graduate teaching assistant in modern languages, performed a dance that ended the entertainment for the evening.

"I learned this dance from my professor who is an expert in Tai arts," Noisaengsri said.

Eric Oliva, senior in construction science, said he has been to many cultural nights because he has a number of international friends who have encouraged him to go.

"I enjoy having the opportunity to meet people from other countries," Oliva said.

Shazia Aqeel, coordinator of Cultural Nite '95, said she was pleased with the number in attendance and the number of performers

Aqeel said she has always been involved in cultural programs and felt that planning the event was important.

"I love meeting people from different cultures. It is very rich," Aqeel said.

1995 Voters' GUIDE

STUDENT ELECTIONS '95

Welcome

to the Kansas State Collegian 1995 Voters' Guide. The Collegian hopes to help you make informed choices about those who would represent the K-State student body as president, vice president, senator or on a college council, Fine Arts Council, Union Governing Board or Board of Student Publications Inc.

The Collegian staff has compiled this guide from questionnaires, which asked questions about the issues and their qualifications and goals of the candidates.

The candidates were asked to keep their responses to less than a certain amount of words to allow everyone space to respond and to be fair. When the candidate went past the word limit, you, the reader/voter, will see an "*." The Collegian didn't cut off responses to make a candidate look foolish or stupid, but to be fair.

So by all means, read, ponder and vote.

STUDENT BODY PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT

Jeremy Blair, marketing

Q. In your opinion, and in 25 words or less, what is the single biggest challenge facing the new student body president?

A. Developing student government into a service organization that's committed to serving the students and will strive for quality in the eyes of the student.

Q. In 25 words or less, tell how you would address on-going executive works, like Access the Future?

A. I am against Access the Future because it is ineffective, expensive and does not directly relate to students here now. Our resources can be spent *

Q. In 50 words or less, tell which issue — tuition and fees, parking or safety is most important to you and why.
A. I think that the increasing fees need to be explained to the student body so that they can determine their legitimacy. I feel that the parking situation is out of hand. The permits and tickets have increased in price yet the students still don't have the space to park. If *

Q. In 50 words or less, tell which issue — tuition and fees, parking or safety is most important to you and why.
A. Tuition is the most pressing issue facing SGA. Failure to contain the cost of attending KSU will hurt not only students but our country's future. We all must work to ensure money is never a barrier to attending KSU for excited, motivated, and qualified students.

Q. In 25 words or less, what makes you more qualified to represent your college than your opponent?
A. I have two years experience representing students at Kansas State in Senate, and coordinate our efforts to improve both SGA and student life on campus.

A. Yes

Q. In 50 words or less, tell which issue — tuition and fees, parking or safety is most important to you and why.
A. Fees. Activities, organizations, and clubs are coming up with some just unnecessary and, at times, almost humorous fees. The last thing a student needs are more fees, and I will work hard to ease the burden on the financially strained college student.

Q. In 25 words or less, what makes you more qualified to represent your college than your opponent?
A. When it comes to getting the job done, I am the guy who can best serve his students.

Q. In 50 words or less, tell which issue — tuition and fees, parking or safety is most important to you and why.

Q. In 50 words or less, tell which issue — tuition and fees, parking or safety is most important to you and why.
A. I believe that fees is the most important issue. The responsibility of student government is to find ways to provide quality services to students. This must be done in the thriftiest manner so that those resources may be distributed to the most effective means to provide student services.

A. Yes

Q. In 50 words or less, tell which issue — tuition and fees, parking or safety is most important to you and why.
A. Tuition and fee increases are items which must be looked at with more scrutiny. As they go up, we start pricing students out of an affordable education, we can work harder on opening communications with the Board of Regents and the legislature to curtail the rising costs of higher education.

Q. In 25 words or less, what makes you more qualified to represent your college than your opponent?
A. I bring a lot of common sense, which I will use in voting for legislation that calls for fee increases and spending of student dollars.

Stephanie Trembley, rhetoric and communication and pre-law

Q. Are you registered to vote in Riley County?
A. No

Q. In 50 words or less, tell which issue — tuition and fees, parking or safety is most important to you and why.
A. Students are the reason for issues like parking, safety and fees. In order for those would-be students to come to K-State, it is imperative tuition is affordable. Higher education is the key for success in today's competitive world, but without affordable education, people will pass over K-State for schools with *

Q. In 50 words or less, tell which issue — tuition and fees, parking or safety is most important to you and why.
A. Affording a college education is a difficult task, yet it is essential to a successful future. When no one can afford college, the issues of parking and safety simply don't matter. I will use my experience with state and student government to control the cost of tuition.

Q. In 25 words or less, what makes you more qualified to represent your college than your opponent?

Q. Are you registered to vote in Riley County?
A. Yes

Q. In 50 words or less, tell which issue — tuition and fees, parking or safety is most important to you and why.
A. To me, the most important issue is the high amount of fees K-State students pay. Student Senate has direct control over fee assessment; thus, student input is vital to these decisions. I will responsibly represent my constituents in order to make fee establishment an accurate reflection of the students' desires.

Q. In 25 words or less, what makes you more qualified to represent your college than your opponent?
A. As your senator, I will be committed to my position. I am responsible, receptive to new ideas and will work hard to make a difference.

Q. Are you registered to vote in Riley County?
A. No

Q. In 50 words or less, tell which issue — tuition and fees, parking or safety is most important to you and why.
A. To me, safety is the most important issue here at K-State. All of the others are very important, too, but if the students aren't safe and alive, then none of the other issues will matter. It's not that our campus is unsafe, it could just be made a lot safer.

Q. In 25 words or less, what makes you more qualified to represent your college than your opponent?
A. From being a Senate intern, I have a good understanding of how the Business College works into K-State, so I can best serve our college.

Jason Bitter, finance

Q. Are you registered to vote in Riley County?
A. Yes

Q. In 50 words or less, tell which issue — tuition and fees, parking or safety is most important to you and why.
A. I believe that tuition is the greatest problem facing both current and prospective students. While all of the issues presented are important and deserve attention, I will work the hardest for tuition. If someone cannot afford today's ever-increasing tuition costs, parking, paying fees and safety on campus become irrelevant.

Q. In 25 words or less, what makes you more qualified to represent your college than your opponent?
A. I'm a new candidate and will bring fresh ideas to Senate. I have leadership abilities as well as honesty and integrity to guide my choices.

Chris Green, business management and international studies

Q. Are you registered to vote in Riley County?
A. Yes

Q. In 50 words or less, tell which issue — tuition and fees, parking or safety is most important to you and why.
A. Safety is the most important issue that I am concerned with at this time. I feel that many students choose to come to K-State because of the small-town atmosphere that is felt in Manhattan. With this is also a sense of safety and security. Over the past semester, the *

Q. In 50 words or less, tell which issue — tuition and fees, parking or safety is most important to you and why.
A. I believe tuition, fees, parking and safety are all equally important issues facing our campus. Tuition and fees are always a crucial concern to all K-State students, and I will work to the best of my ability to lower these costs. Parking is also a critical problem concerning K-State. There *

Q. Are you registered to vote in Riley County?
A. No

Q. In 50 words or less, tell which issue — tuition and fees, parking or safety is most important to you and why.
A. The issue that most concerns me is the issue of biking fees. Having people ride their bikes to school has partially helped the parking problem at Kansas State. If we put a fee on bikes, we're not helping the parking problem. We're just adding to it.

Q. In 25 words or less, what makes you more qualified to represent your college than your opponent?
A. I feel I'm the most qualified candidate because I've discussed the issues with the rank and file business students. I know the issues that concern *

Jon Perez, accounting

Q. Are you registered to vote in Riley County?
A. No

Q. In 50 words or less, tell which issue — tuition and fees, parking or safety is most important to you and why.
A. Safety, no student fee increases and more group representation are important issues for the next year. Keys to these are more lighting, more night police patrols, broader escort services, addressing inefficient spending so fees can be held constant or reduced, and giving individual groups more voice in the issues.

Q. In 25 words or less, what makes you more qualified to represent your college than your opponent?
A. Having been a Senate Intern and a Business Council Representative have given me important experience that will help me work for the students.

John "Colonel" Potter, finance and political science

Q. Are you registered to vote in Riley County?
A. No

Q. In 50 words or less, tell which issue — tuition and fees, parking or safety is most important to you and why.
A. Student fees are extremely important. If runaway spending is allowed in Senate, it hurts the student body and deters people from attending K-State. I endorse implementing optional student fees. By having optional fees, students will spend less to graduate and will have a direct voice in where their money goes.

Q. In 25 words or less, what makes you more qualified to represent your college than your opponent?
A. Serving as Senate Parliamentarian, Executive Committee member and Senate Operations Committee member gives me the experience and know-how that is needed to function well.

Q. Are you registered to vote in Riley County?
A. No

Q. In 50 words or less, tell which issue — tuition and fees, parking or safety is most important to you and why.
A. I believe we need to regulate the increases in tuition. Recently, tuition has been increasing at an unprecedented rate. I think the state should cover more of the cost, considering we are a state-funded institution.

Q. Are you registered to vote in Riley County?
A. No

Q. In 50 words or less, tell which issue — tuition and fees, parking or safety is most important to you and why.
A. Tuition is my primary concern. I believe that K-State needs to control its continuous increases in tuition costs. I think that there are alternative solutions to the continuous increase that I have seen during my attendance at K-State. As your business senator, this will be my first priority.

Q. In 25 words or less, what makes you more qualified to represent your college than your opponent?
A. Personally, I believe that I possess that unique quality that allows me to work exceptionally well with groups as a leader and a subordinate.

Steve Weatherman, marketing and management

Q. Are you registered to vote in Riley County?
A. Yes

Q. In 50 words or less, tell which issue — tuition and fees, parking or safety is most important to you and why.
A. Tuition and fees are the roots of all evil. Deep, huh? The cost of an education at K-State must be controlled in any way possible before we are priced out of opportunities. If you can't afford to attend, then you can forget about all of the other issues. It's that *

Q. In 50 words or less, tell which issue — tuition and fees, parking or safety is most important to you and why.
A. The issue that I feel is the most important is tuition. I believe that tuition increases must be controlled so that students aren't denied the opportunity to get an education and better themselves just because they can't afford to pay tuition that continues to rise.

Q. In 25 words or less, what makes you more qualified to represent your college than your opponent?
A. I am qualified to represent the College of Engineering because I would always keep the students' best interests in mind as senator and serve responsibly *

Q. In 50 words or less, tell which issue — tuition and fees, parking or safety is most important to you and why.
A. I feel tuition is the most important issue right now. The new linear tuition rate has too high of a proposed credit-hour cap. I feel a cap of 12 credit hours would best represent the needs of a majority of students.

A. No

Q. In 50 words or less, tell which issue — tuition and fees, parking or safety is most important to you and why.

Dole announces his 3rd run for the presidency

by Kimberly Hefling

Sen. Bob Dole, R-Kan., officially announced his candidacy for president of the United States Monday morning at a rally at the Kansas Expocentre in Topeka.

"It's great to be here in Kansas," he said. "Of course, I'm not the first Kansan to say, 'There's no place like home.' But for me, the words have special meaning.

"Wherever I have traveled in this life, I have never forgotten where I came from or where I go home to."

People of all ages attended the event. Throughout the rally, high-school bands played and signs were displayed. When Dole finished speaking, balloons fell from the ceiling.

"Our country must again have leaders who believe in our people and are proud of our values," he said. "We need leaders who will summon from each of us the best of our character, who will call us as a nation to our full potential. I want to be president so I can do this for America."

Dole said when he went to fight in World War II, it was to defend a community of values unique in the world. It has been about 50 years since Dole was injured in World War II. He said when he returned from the war, he was sustained by the love and generosity of life's possibilities.
